"Well do I remember his first appearance after this calamity was divinged, when he walked into Court one day in January, 1856. There was no affectation, and no reality of jacing (i) no look of indifference or defiance; but the manly and modest air of a gentleman conscious of some folly, but of perfect rectunife and of most heroic and honourable resolutions. He had not even then a political enemy. There was not one of those whom his thoughtlessness had so sorely provoked, who would not have given every spare forthing he possessed to relieve Sir Walter."

On the eighteenth day after the catastrophe, Scott

records in his Diary

Of all the blessedness of sleep.

"I made not the slightest panes, nor dreamed a single-dream, nor even changed my side. This is a blessing to be grateful for."

But, alas! other clouds were again "lowering o'er his house;" and a few weeks later we find him recording: son, anny: other clouds were again "lowering o'er his house;" and a few weeks later we find him recording; "March 12.—Lady S., the fatthful and true componion of my fortunes, good and had, for so many years, has, but with difficulty, been prevailed on to see Dr. Abercrouble; and his opinion is far from involutable: . . . yet her constitution is so good, that, it she will be guided by advice, things may be yet amelicrated, God grout it! for really these misfortunes come too close upon each other."

The late opulent lord of Abbotrford and its lofty pile now "takes lodgings" at Edinburgh, and thus he solilo-

shuning so brightly on these dull walls. Methurs you were looking as bright on the banks of the Tweed; but look where you will, Sir Sun, you look upon sorrow and suffering."

"Moy 16.—Received the melancholy intelligence that all is ever at Ablotsford."

"Ablotsford, May 18.—She died at nine in the morning, after being very ill for two days—easy at hast. I arrived here late last night. Anne is worn out, and has had bysteries, which returned on my arrival. Here broken accents were like those of a child, the language as well as the tones broken, but in the most gentle voic of submission: 'Poor mamme-never return again—gone forever—a better place.' . . When I contrast what this place now is with what it has been not long since, I think my beart will break. Lonely, aged, deprived of my family—all but poor Anne; an impoverished, an embarrased man, deprived of the sharer of my thoughts and counsels, who could always tulk down my sense of the calamitous apprehensions which break the heart that must bear them alone! . . I have seen her! The figure I beheld is and is not my Charlotte, my thirty years' companion! . . . If I write long in this way, I shall write down my resolution, which I should rather write up, if I could. I wooder how I shall do with the large portion of thoughts which were hers for thirty years. I suspect they will be hers yet for a glong time at least."

"May 18.—Sho is sentient and conscious of my emotions somewhere—somehow; where, we cannot tell; have, we cannot lell; yet would I not at this moment renounce the mysterious yet certain hope that I shall see her in a better world, for all that this world can give me. . . They are arranging the chamber of death; that which was long the apartment of commission bappiness, and of whose arrangements (better than in richer houses) she was so proud. They are treading fast and thick. For weeks you could have heard a footfall. Oh, my God!"

"Britishurph, May 30.—Returned to town last night with Charles. This morning resume ordinary habits of rising early, work which she gave me. My recollections on waking were melancholy enough."

On the last day of the ensuing year (1827) Scott gratefully enumerates the many evidences of the Divine goodness and mercy which claimed his devout gratitude,thus concluding :

"For all times great blessings it becomes me well to be thankful to God, who, in his good time and good pleasure, sends us good as well as evil."

On the presentation of "a state of affairs" after the bankruptees of January 16, 1826, it appeared that Scott was indebted to Constable & Co.'s orelitors, as a partner of Ballantyne & Co., for nearly £72,000, and that the whole amount of Ballantyne & Co.'s debts was £110,000, for the whole of which Scott was liable. About half of the $72,000 due to Constable & Co. being included in the debts of Ballantyne & Co., Scott's total business liabilities were about £147,000, (any $650,000.)

"He thought that, by devoting the rest of his life to the service of his creditors, he could in the upshot pay the last farthing he owed them. They (with one or two patry exceptions) applauded his honourable intentions and resolutions, and partook to a large extent in the relunce of their debtor. Nor had they subcalculated as to their interest. He paid the pensity of health and life, but he saved his homour and his self-respect.

'The glory dies not, and the grief is post.'

Local var: Life of Nort, chap. [xviii.

Woodstock was completed March 26, 1826, (the 60th day after the bankruptcy.) and on the 3d of April the author makes the pleasing record,

"I have the extended and gratifying news that Wood-stock is sold for £8228; all ready money,—a matchiess sale for less than three months' work. It Napoleon does as well, or near it, it will put the trust a fairs in high flourish. Four or five years of leisure and industry would, with such success, amply replace my losses."

But "Napoleon"—commenced in June, 1825, really written in about twelve months, and published in June, 1827—not only did "as well," but much better:

"The Napoleon (first and second editions) produced for the graditors a sum which it even now startles me to mention.—
$18,000. As by the time the historical work was published nearly half of the First Series of Chronicles of the Canangane nearly nair of the First Series of Chronicies of the Canongare had been written, it as obvious that the amount to which Not's Hierary industry, from the close of 1825 to the 10th of June, 1827, had dominished his debt, cannot be stated at less than 228,000. Had health been spared him we soon must be have freed himself from all his encumbrances."—Lockhart: Life of Scott, chap. lxxlii,

Let us continue this pleasing theme: a particular account of the products of this tecming, brain during the last five years of its marvellous activity can be postponed to a future page.

At a meeting of trustees and creditors held December

17, 1830, there was then aunounced another dividend on the Ballantyne estate of "then announced another dividend on the Ballantyne estate of three shillings in the pound,—thus reducing the original amount of the debt to about 254,000,... The meeting was numerous; and, not contented with a renewed vote of thanks to their debtor, they passed unanimously the following resolution:... 'That Sir Walter Scott he requested to accept of his furniture, plate, linear, paintings, library, and curiosities of every descrip-tion, as the best means the creditors have of expressing their very high sense of his most honourable conduct, and in grateful acknowledgement for the unpostabled and meet acceptables. acknowledgment for the unparalleled and most successful exer-tions he has made and continues to make for them."

To run ahead of our story a little: at the time of Sir Walter's death, twenty months after the preceding date, there remained due the £54,000 just referred to: which was settled, shortly after his death, by £22,000 which had been insured on his life, £2000 in the hands of the of the profits accruing from Sir Walter's copyright property and literary remains. Mr. Cadell proved a good manager: before 1850, by the issue of various editions skilfully adapted to all classes of buyers of Scott's writings, his £30,000 had been reimbursed, and a handsome sum in addition been carried to the credit side of profit and loss, "for the benefit of all whom it might concern. See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1849, i. 323; Lon. Athen., 1851, 200.

Scott's Works are new pub. by the eminent house of Adam & Charles Black, of Edinburgh; and of their beautiful editions we shall have something to say hereafter.

Thus had prodigies been achieved by the unquenchable seal, the indomitable energy, the persevering effort of this mobie-hearted man. But the "Great Magician," after all, was mortal; and no mortal mind could long sustain itself under such pressure. He who desires to linger ever the sad story of the gradual decay of such an intel-lest—grand even in its ruins—must seek elsewhere than these pages. We have had enough of sorrow; and we hasten to the "ololing scene." In November, 1830, Scott retired from his office of Principal Clerk in the Court of Sessions, with an allowance of £800 per augum in lieu of the full salary of £1300. The Government offered to supply the deficiency by a pension; but this distanteful gratuity Scott's creditors permitted him to decline. During the next summer, Castle Dangerous and Count Robert of Paris were concluded; and he now consented to follow the advice of his physicians, and spent a winter abroad, in "complete abstinence from all spent a winter abroad, in "complete abstinence from all literary labour."

"Ho is now," thus he addresses the reader in the conclusion of the volumes just named, "on the eve of visiting foreign parts; a ship of war is commissioned by its Royal Master to carry the author of Waverley to climates in which he may possibly attom such a restoration of health as may serve him to spun his thread to an end in his own country. . . The public have claims on his gratitude for which the author of Waverley has no means of expression; but he may be permitted to hope that the powers of his mind, such as they are, may not have a different date from those of his body; and that he may again meet his patronizing friends, if not exactly in his old fashion of literature, at least in some branch which may not call forth the remark that remark that

'Superfinous lags the veteran on the stage.'"

He went forth from his halls with the prayers and benedictions of all classes:—the hearty valedictory of the honest rustic and the genius of Wordsworth were alike eloquent in supplications for the one whom so many hearts would follow o'er the deep.

The tribute of Wordsworth was worthy alike of the poet and of his illustrious theme:

and or his linestrous treme:
A trouble, not of clouds or weeping rain
Nor of the setting sum's pathetic light
Engendered, hangs o'er Eddon's triple height;
Spirits of power assembled there complain
For kindred power departing from their sight;
While Tweed, best pleased in chanting a blithe strain while Tweed, best pleased in channing a bittle stra Saddens his voice again, and yet again. Lift up your hearts, ye mourners! for the might Of the whole world's good wishes with him goes! Blossings and prayers, in nobler retinue Than sceptred King or laurelled Conqueror knows, Follow this wondrous potentate. Be true, Ye winds of ocean, and thou midland sea, Waffing your charge to soft Parthenope!"

It was on the morning of the 23d of September that, attended by his daughter Anne and his son-in-law Lock hart, Sir Walter left Abbotsford. At London, Lockhart tells us, "the invalid seemed to enjoy having one or two friends to meet him at dinner," and amongst these he notices "Sir David Wilkie, Thomas Moore, Mr. Milman, and Mr. Washington Irving." Now, if the reader will turn to our article on Washington Irving in reacter with to our retrice or washington Irving in the present work, he will notice (p. 938) that we have made a half-promise to give him Irving's own account of the meeting with Scott to which Lockhart refers. Since those lines were written, Irving has followed his friend to "the house appointed for all living;" but of our conversations with the lamented dead on this and other themes we have preserved a record, and that por-tion which refers to the last interview with Scott, the render, we are confident, will be glad to peruse.

It was at Sunnyside, on a glorious afternoon in June, 1855; that, surrounded by scenery which Irving has best described, he thus continued his reminiscences of one who had loved him so well, and "loved him to the end:"

had loved him so well, and "loved him to the end."
"I was in London when Scott arrived, after his attack of paralysis, on his way to the continent in scarch of health. I received a note from Lockhart, begging me to come and take dinner with Scott and himself the next day. When I entered the room, Scott grasped my band, and looked me steadfastly in the face. "I me has dealt gently with you, my friend, since we parted, he exclaimed:—he referred to the difference in himself since we had met. At dinner, could see that Scott's mind was failing. He was paintilly conscious of it himself. He would talk with much animation, and we would listen with the boost respectful attention; but there was an effort and an embarrass-gment in his manner: he knew all was not right. It was very distressing, and we [Frving, Lockhart, and Anne Scott] tried to keep up the conversation between ourselves, that Sir Walter might talk as little as possible. After dinner he took my area to walk up-stairs, which he did with difficulty. He turned and looked in my face, and said, "They need not rell a man his mind is not affected when his lody is as much impaired as mine." This was my last interview with Scott. I heard afterwards that he was better; but I never as we him again."

Two years later, in narrating the same event, Irving

Two years later, in narrating the same event, Irving told us that as Scott passed up the stairs with him after dinner he remarked,

"Times are sadly changed with me since we walked up the Highland hills together."

The improvement to which Irving refers was but tem porary: health came not with the bracing breezes of the sea, nor with the soft sephyrs of Italia: the tender offices of friends, the eager but subdued seal of admiring strangers, were not unrewarded by evidences of heacht to him to whom they were profusely profiered; the phymeal man was strengthened: but the once glorious mind, -alas! who could that "light relume"?

After an absence of between six and seven months, (he left England October 29,) Sir Walter and his party returned to London on the 13th of June, 1832, and there remained until the 7th of July :

remained until the 7th of July:

"During these melancholy weeks great interest and sympathy were manifested. Allan Cueninghum mentions that, walking home late one night, he found several working men standing together at the corner of Jermyn Street, and one of them asked him, as if there were but one denti-ited in London, 'Do you know, sit, if this is the street where he is Iving?' The inquiries both at the hotel and at my house were incessant; and I think there was hardly a member of the royal family who did not there was hardly a member of the royal family who did there was hardly a member of the royal family who did not send every day."—Lockhart: Life of North, chap. laxxiii. In continuation, let us borrow a few lines from that most curious and pleasing chronicle, Allan Cunning-ham's son's (Peter Cunningham's) Hand-Book of London, Past and Present:

uod, rass and rresent:
"The St. James Hotel, No. 76, on the south side, was the last London lodging of Sir Walter Scott. Hero he lay for a period of three weeks after his return from the Continent, either in absolute stupor or in a waking dream. The room he occupied of three weeks after his return from the Continent, sither in absolute retupor or in a waking dream. The room he occupied was the second-floor back room; and the author of this collection of London memoranda delights in remembering the universal feeling of sympathy exhibited by all cand there were many there) who stood to see the great novelist and puot carried from the hote! to his carriage on the afternoon of the 1th of July, 1832. Many were eager to see so great a man; but all mere curiodity seemed to cease when they saw the vacant eye and prostrate figure of the illustriants poet. There was not a covered lead, and, the writer believes,—from what he could see,—hardly a dry eye, on the occasion."—Edition of 1850, 265.

"As we rounded the hull at Ladhope," says Lockhart, "and the outline of the Edidous burst on limi, he became greatly excited; and when, turning humself on his couch, his eye caught at length his own towers, at the distance of a such, he sprang my with a cry of delight... Mr. Ladlaw was waiting at the porch, and assisted us in lifting him into the duning-room, where his bed had been prepared. He sat bewidered for a few moments, and then, cesting his eye on Landlaw, said, 'Ha! Wille Ladlaw! O, man, how often have I thought of you? By this time his dogs had assembled about his chair—they began to fawn upon hin and lick his hands, and he alternately subbed and smiled over them until sleep oppressand him."

The day following he was perfectly conscious, and on

The day following he was perfectly conscious, and on the next morning still better. Placed by the central window, that he might "look down upon the Tweed," "he expressed a wish that I should read to hon, and when I asked from what book, he said, 'Need you ask? There is but one.' I chose the 14th chapter of St. John's dospel; he listened with mlf' emotion, and said, when I had done, 'Well, this is a great of afort. I have followed you distinctly, and I feel as if I were to be mysell again.' In this placif frum he was again put to bed, and had many hours of soft atumber." e next morning still better. Placed by the central

THE CLOSING STEVE.

"As I was dressing on the morning of Monday, the 17th of September, Nicolson came into my room, and told me that his master had awoke in a state of composite and convolutions, and wished to see me immediately. I found him entirely himself, though in the last extreme of feebleness. His eye was clear and calm—every trace of the wild fire of delirium extinguished. 'Lockhart,' he said, 'I may have but a minute to speak to you. My dear, he a good man—be virtuous—he religious. Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here.' He paused, and I said, 'Shall I send for Sophifa and Anne?' 'No,' said he; 'don't disturb them, poor souls! I know they were up all night—God bless you all!' Will this he sank into a very tranquit sleep, and, indeed, he scarcely afterwards gave any sign of consciousness, except for an instant on the arrival of his sons. They, on learning that the scene was about to close, obtained a now leave of alsence from their posts, and both reached Abbotsford on the 19th. A bout hali-past one P.w. on the 21st of September, Sir Walter breathed his last, in the presence of all his children. It was a beautiful day,—o warm that every window was wide open, and so perfectly still that the sound of all others must delicious to his ear, the gentle ripple of the Tweed over its pebbles, was distinctly sudible as we knelt around the bed and his eldest son kissed and closed his eyes." THE BURIAL

"His funeral was conducted in an uncetentations manner, but the attendance was very great. Few of his old friends then in Scotland were absent, and many, both friends and strangers, came from a great distance. His old domestics and foresters mado it their petition that no hireling isand might assist in carrying his remains. They themselves here the coffin to the heave, and from the heave to the grave... The courty-yard and all the precincts of Abbotsford were crowded with uncovered spectators as the procession was arranged, and as it advanced through Darnick and Meirose, and the adjacent villages, the whole population appeared at their doors in like manner, almost all in black. The train of carriages extended, I understand, over more than a mile; the yeomanry followed in great numbers on horseback; and it was late in the day ere we reached Dryburgh. Some accident, it was observed, had caused the hearse is halt for, several minutes on the summit of the hill at Bemeratik,—cancily where a prospect of remarkable richness opens, and where Sir Walter had always been accustomed to rein his Love. The day was dark and lowering, and the wind high.

"The wide enclosure at the Abbey of Dryburgh was througed with old and young; and when the coffin was taken from the hearro and again hid on the shoulders of the afficted servingmen, one deep sob burst from a thousand fips. Mr. Architectus Williams read the Burial Service of the Church of England; and thus, about half-past five o'clock in the evening of Wednesday, the 20th September, 1832, the remains of Sir Walter Scott were had by the site of his wife in the acqualcher of his accountry, is sure and certain hops of the resurection to chernel life through owe Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change my wile body that it may be tile unto his planting but wingify working whereby he is able to subduce all things to himself?

In that "sure and certain hope" the son-in-law and biographer has since been "gathered to his fathers;" and in the column which commemorates this event we find some reflections which will fitly onnclude this portlon of our skotch:

"The whole family history of Scott and Lockhart affords a striking instance of the 'vanity of human wishes.' Scott's chief ambition was to be a country laird, and the founder of a family of the Scotts of Abbotsford. His inward thought was that his house should continue forever, and the last be called after his os a name. Of Scott's four children, the elder sea [Walter] died childless in India, and the other [Chailes] unmarried in Persia. The younger daughter [Anne] died nct long after her father, and Mrs. Lockhart [Sophis] four years later. Her elder boy, the Hugh Little-John for whom Scott had write ten his Tales of a tirandfather, had died some years before. Lockhart had then a son, [Walter Scott, b. 1825], who is since dead and his only daughter [Charlotte Harriet Jane] has adopted views [in the Roman communion] widely allen from the early associations of Abbotsford. She was married in 1847 to James Robert Hope, Eq., barrister at law, a younger son of the late General the Hon. Six Alexander Hope, and has issue an only daughter, Mary Morrice, born in 1852."—Lom. of Paris; Castle Daugerous, 4 vols. p. 8vo: Reviewed in [

In our notice of Bannatyne, George, we have referred to that admirable volume, The Abbotsford Catalogue: why cannot the Messrs. Black publish editions of this work, to range with their various sets of Scott's works?

There has been recently pub., Memoirs of the Insurrection in Scotland in 1715; by John Master, of Sinclair; with Notes by Sir Walter Scott, Bart., Edited by David Laing and James Macknight, Edin., 1858, 4to, (Abbotsford Club.) Reviewed in Lon. Athen., 1859, ii. 879.

Having thus presented a catalogue raisonné-we venture to call it the fullest and most accurate that has appeared—of Scott's publications, we proceed to notice-

III. STANDARD EDITIONS OF SCOTT'S WORKS.

Of Scott's Poetical Works there were collective editions pub. at Rdinburgh: 1813, 9 vols. Svo; 1815, 10 vols. r. 8vo; 1820, 12 vols. 8vo, (also Miscellaneous Poems, 1820, 8vo;) 1822, 8 vols. 12mo; and his Historical Royal Poems, 1820, 8vo;) rical Romances were pub. in 1822 in 6 vols. Svo: also Novels and Tales, in 12 vols. Svo: Tales and Romances, 7 vols. Svo, &c.: editions, 1823, '24, '27. A collective edition of his Miscellaneous Prose Writings was pub. in 1827, 6 vols. 8vo.

Since these dates, many of his works have been published, in many shapes and in many places, on both sides of the Atlantic.

The Standard editions of his works (most of those which we notice below are issued by Messrs, Adam & Charles Black, of Edinburgh) are as follows:

"EDYNGUAGE, 5th October, 1806.
"In consequence of statements regarding the expiry of the copyright of the Waverley Novers, the Publishers take this apportunity of rominding the Public that the only portion of these Works now out of copyright is that which was first issued from the press in 1814.

"SIR Walter Scorr, in 1829, carefully corrected and improved the text of this first issue to such an extent that hardly a page remained without material alteration, and, besides, added the Notes and Introductions.

"To this amended Edition he gave the name of the 'Author's Editoria, as being the only one he desired the Public to rogard as bearing his sanction and approved.

"All other Editions must therefore be regarded as imperfect in the Text and incomplete in the Notes and Introductions.

"A. & C. Black."

"A te not generally known, we believe, that an expurgated edition of Walter Scott has been published for the bonefit of Roman Catholice; but the fact is recorded in the new edition of Feller's 'Blographie Universelle,' published at Lyons, with a continuation by the Abb Sumonin. 'Though Walter Scott,' we are told, in the notice of his name, 'is not a romancer of the dangerous class, he gives, nevertheless, too lively a picture of the passions, and makes frequent attacks on Catholic institutions: this hast led Pexacurilles to undertake a new and abridged translation of his works, in which he has taken care to omit all that is condemnable. This translation is published under the amplices of the Society of St. Nicholas, No. 39 Rue de Sèvres, Paris, and is principally saited for young persons.' It will be long, we presume, before there is any English 'Family Walter Scott' to take its place by the side of the Family Shakspeare."—

The same enterprising house has supplemented this beautiful series of the Novels by a new edition of Lockhart's Life of Scott, in 9 vols. 18mo, 1861-62. This edition professes to be "much fuller than any other ever published, containing several Biographical Notes not included in the Philipped Several Biographical Notes not included the several Biographical Research R cluded in the Edinburgh copy." Black are now (1869) issuing a new edition of Lockhart's Life of Scott, 10 vols. fp. 8vo, Roxburghe binding, £1 1ae. After a silence of thirty years respecting Lockhart's Mo-moirs of Scott, the London Quarterly Review reviewed the work in January, 1868.

"Men do not write ficely," says the reviewer, "about those whom they have long loved and recently lost; and so year after year stole away without any notice being taken of perhaps the very best piece of biography which is to be found in the English or any other modern language.

"But time, which sollens men's regiets, awakens, or ought to awaken, them to a sense of duty; and duty rather to the living than to the dead requires that the silence which we have thus far maintained should at length be broken."

It was announced by A. & C. Black & Co. in 1852 (Lon.

Athenseum, 504) that

"Since the first publication of the Waverley Novels not fewer than One Hundred and Twenty Thousand copies have been sold in this country, and at least as many in the United States."

According to Great Facts, published in 1858, "Upwards of 3900 tons weight of paper have been consumed in producing the various chitions of Sir Walter Scott's Writings and Life; and the duty paid to devernment on the paper, even at the present reduced rate, amounts to no less a sum than £61,450."

The £125,000 (we exclude the £22,000 life insurance) paid by the proceeds of Scott's writings to his creditors appears a very large coinage of one man's brain; but, according to Mr. Howitt's claborate calculation, (Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets, vol. ii.,)
"it appears certain that his works must have produced to the author or his trustees, at the very least, holf a million of money!"-say two million two hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars. And, if this sum represents only the profits of the author and his assigns, how vast must be the amount expended by the public for Scott's Works!

IV. SCOTT THE POET.

For these latter divisions of our sketch we had marked out many passages of acute criticisms by many of the most eminent critics of the past half-century. But here, as elsewhere, we are straitened in our limits, and must omit much more than we quote.

as elsewhere, we are straitened in our limits, and must omit much more than we quote.

"Condent in the force and originality of his own genius, he has not been afraid to avail hunself of commonplaces both of diction and of sentiment, whenever they appeared to be beautiful and impressive,—using them, however, at all times with the skill and spirit of an inventor; and, quite certain that he could not be mistaken for a plagiarist or imitator, he has made free use of that great treasury of characters, images, and expressions which had been accumulated by the most celebrated of his predecessors,—at the same time that the rapidity of his transitions, the novelty of his combinations, and the spirit and variety of his own thoughts and inventions, show plainly that he was a borrower from any thing but poverty, and took only what he would have gives if he had been born in an earlier generation. The great secret of his popularity, however, and the leading characteristic of his poetry, appear to us to consist ovidestly in this, that he has made more use of common topics, images, and expressions than any original poet of later times, and, at the same time, displayed more genius and originality than any recent author who has worked in the same materials. By the faster peculiarity he has cuttled hisself to the admiration of every description of readers; by the former he is resemmended in an aspecial manner to the isexperienced,—at the heard of some little offence to the more cultivated and fastidione. . . . Among his minor peculiarities we might notice his singular talent for description, and especially for the degarigation of scenes abounding in motion or action of any kind. By this department, indiced, we conceive him to be almost without a rived, either among modern or antient poets; and the character and process of his descriptions are as extraordinary as their effect is astenishing."—Lost Jupper: Kriz. "Though greatly inferior in many things to his illustrious brethren, { Wordworth and Byron,} Seatt is periaps, after all, the most unequivocally original. We do not know of any model after which rie form of his p incipal Peems has been moulded. They bear no resemblance, and, we must allow, are far inferior, to the heroic Poems of Greece; nor do they, though he has been called the Ariosto of the North, seem to us to resemble, in any way whatever, any of the great Poems of modern Luly. He has given a most intensely real tep esemtation of the living spirit of the chivalrous age of his country. He has not shrouded the figures or the characters of his heroes in high postical instre, so as to dazzlo us by resplendent fictitious beings shiming through the scenes and events of a half imaginary world. They are as much roal men in his poetry as the "nighty Earle" of old are in our histories and annals. This incidents, too, and events, are all wonderfully like those of real lile; and when we add to this, that all the most interesting and impressive superstitions and tancies of the times are in his poetry incorporated and intertwined with the ordinary itsense of mere human existence, we feel ourselves hurried from this our civilized age back into the troubled boson of semi-barbarous life, and mode keen partakers in all its impassioned and portical creditions.—His paems are historical actualities,—true in all things to the spirit of his history, but everywhere oversprend with those bright and breathing colours which only genius can bostow on reality; and when it is recollected that the times in which the scenes are laid and his heroes act were distinguished by many of the most energetic virtues that can grace or dignify the character of a free people, and marked by the operation of great passions and important events, every one must feel that the poetry of Walter Scott is of Christopher North.

"Let me talk to you of the Prince Regent. He ordered me to be presented to him at a ball; and, after some sayings poculiarly pleasing from royal lips as to my own attempts, he talked to me of you and your immortalties; he preferred you to severy hard, past and present, and asked which of your works pleased memost. It was a difficult question. I answered, I thought the Lay. He said his own opinion was nearly similar. In speaking of the others, I told him that I thought you more particularly the poet of Princes, as they never appeared more fascinating than in Marmion and the Lady of the Lake. He was pleased to coincide, and to dwell on the description of your Jameses as no less royal than poetical. He spoke alternately of Homer and yourself, and secuned well acquainted with both."—Lord Byres to Stott. July 6, 1812; Lockhart's Scott, chap, xxiv.

"Scott is a poet truly antional and heroic. He finds his scenes in his native land, and his heroes and herologs in British historical figures, with all the well-defined proportions of statues,—with this difference, that they act and spoks according to the will of the poet. Yet, though in external elegance and precision of outline they resemble works of art, they have less of the repose of sculpture about them than any characters in modern song. No one since the days of Hotner has any with such an impetuous and burning breath the muster, the march, the onset, and all the flory viciasitudes of art lett."—ALLAN CUSRINGARM: Blog. and Crit. In the first place, there was the indisputable impress of worth, of genuine human force, in them. This, which lies in some degree, or is thought to lie, at the bottom of all popularity, did to an unusual degree disclose itself in these rhymed romances of Scott. "Compared with true and great posts, our Soutish Minstrel is but 's metre ballad-monger." We would rather have written one tong of Burns, or a single passage in Lord Byron's 'Heaven and Earth,' or one of Wordsworth's 'Enacles and Good Nights,' than all his epics. What is he to Spenser, over whose immortal, ever-amiable verse heanty havers and trembles, and who has shed the purple light of finery (rom his ambrosial wings over all nature? What is there of the night of Milton, whose head is canopled in the him serves, and who makes us to six with him there? What is there (in his ambling rhymes) of the deep pathos of Chaster? Or of the o'er-informing power of Stakespeare, whose to, a watching silke the minutest traces of character and the strongest mevernents of passion, 'glances from the contract of 'giantes from Sir Walter has no voluntury power of combination: all his associations (as we said before) are those of habit or of tradition. He is a mere narrative and descriptive poet, garralous of the old time. The definition of his poetry is a pleasing superficiality."—HARLITT: Spirit of the Age: Sir Walter Scott.

"Speaking of the poets of the day, Sir James [Mackintosh] observed, 'I very much doubt whether Scott will survive long. Hitherto nothing has stood the test of time but laboured and finished verse; and of this Scott has none. If I were to say which of the poets of the day is most thely to be read herester, I should give my opinion in favor of some of Campbell's posms. Scott, however, has a wonderful fertility and vivality. It may be proper to add that the aliasion is here exclusively to he poetry of Scott. V. SCOTT THE NOVELIST.

April, 1865.

V. Scott the Novelist.

We estom the productions which the great novelist of Sootland has poured forth with startling speed from his rich treasury, not only as multiplying the sources of delight to thousands, but as shedding the most genial influences on the taste and feeling of the people. . . . His persons are no shadowy sbatraotions,—no personifications of a dogma.—no portrants of the author, varied in contains but similar in features. With all their rich varieties of character, whether their heroical spirit touches on the godifica or their wild eccentricities border on the farcical, they are men fashboned of human earth and warm with human sympathies. He does not seek for the sublime in the mere intensity of burning passion, or for sources of enjoyment in those feverish gratifications which some would teach us to believe the only telicities worthy of hush and impossioned souls. He writes every where with a keen and healthful relish for all the good things of life,—constantly refreehes us, where we least expected it, with a sense of that pleasure which is spread through the east hat to be caught in stray gifts by whoever will find; and brightens all things with the spirit of gladness. There is little of a meditative or retrospective cast in his works. Whatever age he chooses for his story, lives before us; we become contemporaries of all his persons, and sharers in all their fortunes. Of all men who have ever written, excepting Shakspeare, he has perhaps the least of exclusiveness, the least of those feelings which keep men apart from their kind. He has his own predilections,—and we love him the better for them, over when they are not ours,—but they never prevent him from grasping with cordial spirit all that is human. His tolerance is the most complete, for it extends to adverse bigotries; his love of onlyment does not exclude the ascette from his respect, nor does his fendiness for heroditary rights and Lime-honoured institutions prevent his admiration of the ferty zeal of a sectary. "The works of Scott produce their effect rather by the combination of many qualities than the predominance of any. In depth of feeling, we think he yields to the author of Amastasius; in lavention of incident and disposition of plot, he is equalled by many; his humour will hardly hear a comparison with that of Sterne, or the best park of Kielding; and in the direct and furcible expression of the stronger passions, we should be instincted to give the preference both to thodwin and the author of Valerius. But his strength lies in the possession and harmonious adjustment of most of the qualities requisite to the novellat, none engrossing the whole unich more excluding another, but all working together in kindly unson: learning arrayed in the most picture-sque combinateurs; observation of life embodied not in abstractions, but in living forms; humour springing out of tenderness, like smiles struggling through tears; the spirit of another kinghthood leavening the worldly wisdom of modern times; and the imagination of the poet adorning, without impairing, the common sympathics and good-humoured engaging of the man."—Propressor Grones More: Excy. "It is the great glory of Scott that, by nice attention to costume and character in his novels, he has raised them to historic importance without impairing their interset as works of art. Who now would imagine that he could form a satisfactory notion of the golden days of Queen Ress that had not read 'Kenti-worsh,' or of Richard Cour de Lion and his brave paladins that had not read 'Ivenhee': . . Scott was, in truth, master of the picturesque. He understood better than any historian since the lime of Livy how to dispose his lights and shades no as to produce he most etricking result. This property of ronance he had a right to borrow. This trient is particularly observable in 1975.

the animated parts of his story,—in his battles, for example. He man has painted those terrible scenes with greater effect. . . . It is when treading on Scottish ground that he seems to feel all his strength. 'I seem always to step more firmly,' he said to some one, when on my own native heather.' His mind was steeped in Scottish lore, and his bosom warmed with a sympathetic glow for the age of chivalry.'—WILLIAM H. PERSCOTT . Bio., and Cri. Miscell, ed. 1895, 284, 285, 286. "Two of Moore's contemporaries must be placed above him in any fair estimate of the authors of the first part of the nine-teenth century. Byron rose as a poet above all his rivals, ... Scott is the other wonder of this age. Picturesque, interesting, and bard-like as are his narrative poems, the pathos, humour, description, character, and, above all, his rivals, ... Scott is the other wonder of this age. Picturesque, interesting, and bard-like as are his narrative poems, the pathos, humour, description, character, and, above all, the marvellous fertility, displayed in the novels, show far greater power: a whole region of the territory of Imagination is occupied by this extraordinary man, alone and unapproachable. . . . The novels of Scott will furnash entertainment to many generations; nor is there likely to be any race of men so fastidious as to require any thing ourse, so grave as to seorn all delight from this kind of composition.'—Lond John Russell: Mmorra, de. of Thomas Moore, 1853, i., Fref., xxvi. "Mackintosh was very cheerful when he joined us at dinner,—none the worse for his long, studious morning. On some observations of mine about the comparatively uninteresting character of Waverley, and of the leading characters, or rather the heroes, of some other of Walter Scott's novels, he said that Sir Walter was most successful in the low Scotch characters. Old Mause, Cuddie, &c. were the most valuable additions he had brought to the general stock of original characters. . 'Scott,' he said, 'is very cold in some parts of his Scottish history, particularly in the parts about Bruce and Wallace. . . VI. GENERAL CHARACTER AND INFLUENCE OF SCOTT'S WRITINGS.

"Up to the era of Sir Walter, living people had some vague, general, indistinct notions about dead people mouldering away to nothing, centries ago, in regular kirk-y ards and chance burial-places, "mang muirs and mosses many O, somewhere or other in that difficultly-distinguished and very delatable district called the Borders. All at once he touched their tombs with a divining-rod, and the turf streamed out ghosts, some in woodmen's dresses, most in warrior's mail; queer archers leaped forth, with yew lows and quivers, and giants stalked shaking spears! The gray chronicles smiled, and, taking up his pen, wrote in lines of light to annals of the chivalrous and heroic days of suid fendal Scotland. The nation then, for the first time, knew the character of its ancestors; for these were not perfere—not they, indeed—nor phantons of the brain, but gaunt flash and blood, or glad and givenous;—base-born cottage churle of the adden time, breams Scottish, became familiar to the love of the nation's beart, and so to its pride did the high-born lineage of palace kings. . . We know now the character of our own people as it showed itself in war and peace—in palace, castle, half, but, lovel, and shieling—through centuries of advancing civilization, from the time when Kälnburgh was yeleped Auld Reekie, down to the period when the bright idea first occurred to her inhabit, and to call her the Modern Athens."—Pror. In poetry and romance, he showed that there was not a cerser of these islands which was not, as far froub being wahawted, standing thick with the richest materials for the most wonderful and beautiful creations. If is influence on Italy, France, and Germany we shall afterwards have occasion to notice. On the literature of Great Britain we have occasion to notice. On the literature of Great Britain we believe it to have exerted on the whole a most beneficial effect; not, indeed, that any professed imitation of his manner has yot appeared which possesses great claims to genus, but that he has carried a higher spirit into novel-writing,—taught us how the simple feelings of peasants, and the hundle pathos of humble life, and the reientings of feeling among the outcasts of society, might be made to hiend with scenes of high imagination; that his writings are calculated to strengthen the ties of our common humanity; that they never tend to fester a had, or to throw ridicule upon a good or generous, feeling; while, speaking of them in a merely literary point of view, they taught lessons of simplicity, good taste, moderation, and skill in sexing the best points both of character and description, which have not been without their effect even on those by whom the mere manner of Scott, or his choice of subjects, have been studiously avoided."

"Criticism on his works is now superfluous. They have taken their enduring station in the literature of the world. If the applicates of foreign nations be equivalent, as it is said, to the voice of posterity, no author who ever wrote his obtained that honour in so largo a measure. His novels, his peans, have been translated into every civilized language; his horoes and horoines have become household world all over the world. The painter, the sculptor, the engraver, the musician, have sought inspiration from his pages. The manes of his works, or the personages introduced into them, are impressed on the man-of-war or the quadrille, the race-house or the steamboat. The number of persons who became famous by following, in their different lines, the ideas of Sir Walter, is immense, and comprehends all classes of intellect or enterprise. The tribes of imitators, whether of his verse or prose, whom he has called into existence, are countless. Many of them are persons of great abilities and unquestioned genus. Which of them will be named in competition with the master? Not one,"—Dr. William Macin. France's Mag., O tober, 1832; repub. in his Mixeell, Writings, ed. by Dr. R. S. Mackanzie, 1857, v. 176. "Sir Walter Scott is universally considered as the greatest writer of imagination of this century; and his reputation has been so wide-spread and lasting, that it may reasonably be antequated that it will not maternally decline in succeeding times. Like most other great nem, the direction of his genius was, in a great degree, determined by the circumstances in which he arose; but its character was exclusively his own. He rose to manhood during the heart-stirring conflict with the French Rovolution; and his mind, naturally ardent, was early inflamed by the patriotic and warlike feelings which that context naturally produced. A volunteer himself in the yeomany ranks, his animated strains induced many to follow his example. The influence of those circumstances is very conspicuous in his writings, and many of the finest passages in his descriptions of Flodden and Bannoakburn were suggested by the munic warlars on Portobello Sands, near Edinburgh, where his corps exercised. This in some degree directed the application, but it did not stamp the character, of his genius. That was entirely his own. Close observation of nature, whether animated or inanimate, was his great characteristic; the brilliancy of fancy, the force for imagination, were directed to clothing with sparkling colours her varied creations. It is hard to say whether his genius was most conspicuous in describing the beauties of nature of delineating the passions of the heart: he was at once pi berial and demantic. To this he goes his great success,—hence his world-"Sir Walter Scott is universally considered as the greatest her varied creations. It is hard to say whether his genius was most conspicuous in describing the beauties of nature or delineating the passions of the heart: he was at once pi torial and dramatic. To this he owes his great ancess,—hence his worldwide reputation. He was first known as a pact; but charming as his pootic conceptions were, they were ere long eclipsed by the wide-spread fame of his pross romances. The Novels of the Author of Waverley caused the Poems of Walter Scott to be for a time forgotten. But time has re-established them in their acidentic, and great as is still the fame of the Scotch novels, it is rivalled by the heart-stirring verses of Marmion, the enduring charm of the Lady of the Lade. . . No man ever threw a more charming radiance over the traditions of ancient times, but none ever delineated in a nobler spirit the vintues of the present; and his discriminating eve discovered them equally under the thatch of the cottage as in the halts of the castle. It has been thatch of the cottage as in the halts of the castle. It has been that the most ever contributed more powerfully to that purification without which all others are nugatory,—the reform of the house that none ever contributed more powerfully to that purification without which all others are nugatory,—the reform of the howers of faction of whom it may with truth be said that he never wrete a line which, on death-bed, he could wish recalled."

"The works of Walter Scott have incorporated themselves with the thoughts and concerns of the whole civilized world for more than a quarter of a century, and have had a controlling insuence over the age in which he lived. Who is there that, on looking back over a great portion of his life, does not find the gesius of Scott administering to his pleasures, beguing his cares, and suching his lonely correws?"—Warstwore Invisa, "It has been observed that one of the carious contrasts which make up that complex creature, Walter Soutt, is the strong attraction which drow him, as a Lowlander the born natured antagonist of the deal, to the Highland people. Looking back on the Celtic claim, as we happily may, as a thing of the far past, softened by distance, coloured by the finest tints of poetry, and with that background of noble scenery which has afterded to many of us such pure and lofty pleasure, we cannot conceive without a painful effort that within a few years of Scott's own birth the Highlander had been to the Lowlander much what the Highlander had been to the Lowlander much what the Highlander had been to the Lowlander much what the Soot proper the source of continupt and of repugnance. Such a feeling is one of the worst instincts of human nature; it is an unmistakable part of the brute animal within us; more than any other came, the hatred of ruce to race has hampered the progress of man. There is also no feeling which is more persistent and obstinate. But it has been entirely conquered in case of the Saxon and the Gadi. Now, this vast and salutary change in national opinion is directly due to Scott. Something of the kind might possibly have come with time; but he, in fact, was the man whose lot was to accomplish it. This may be regarded, on the whole, as his greaters achievement. He united the sympathies of two hostile races by the sheer force of gonius. He healed the bitterness of centuries. Scott did nuch in idealizing, as poetry should, the common life of his contemporaries, He equally did much in rendering the past history, and the history of other countries in which Scottlinen played a conspicuous part, reni to us. But it is hardly a figure of speech to say that he created the Celtic

VII. SCOTT THE MAN.

Referring the reader to Scott's Autobiography and Diary, and the full-length portrait by the skilful hand of Mr. Lockhart, for a faithful presentment of the personal characteristics of the illustrious author, we borrow a few lines from the many etchings of Sir Walter which have been offered to the cariosity of his admirers:

have been offered to the curiosity of his admirers:

"In September, 1928, Richardson and I visited Scott for a few days at Albotaford, and had the rare good fortune to find him nearly alone; and nothing could be more delightful. His simplicity and naturalness after all his fame are absolutely incredible. I remember him when he was famous for almost nothing except initiating Eskgrova, (a power which, fortunately, he has never lovel, and, his manners are the same now that they were then. No bast idea will be formed of Scott's conversation by supposing one of his Scotch novels to be cut into talk. It's not so much conversation as a joyous flow of anecdote, story, character, and scene, mostly humorous, always graphic, and never personal or ill-natured. His habits at this time were these: he rose about six; wrote from about half-past six till nine,—the Second Scries of the Tales of a Grandisther being then the work; breakfasted and lounged from nine to eleven; wrote from always. rose about six; wrote from asome mar-part was the more-second Series of the Tales of a Grandishbre being then the work; breakfasted and lounged from nine to eleven; wrote from eleven; till about two; walked till about four; dined at five, partaking frosly, but far from immedientely, of various wines; and then, as seen as the ladies withdrow, taking to cigars and hot whisky-toddy; wont to the drawing-room soon, where he inapired everybody with his passion for Scotch nunsic; and, if anxiously asked, never reduced to recite any old bullad or tell any old tale. The house was asleep by eleven. When fitted up for dinner, he was like any other comfortably fill-dressed gentleman. But is the morning, with the large coarse Jacket, great atick, and leathern cap, he was bandy Dinmont, or Dick Hattrick,—a sunggier or a peacher. Would that his money and his care had boom given to a better subject than Abbuteford!"—Load Corgumn: Memorials of his Own Time, 1856, chap, vi. See, also, chap, iv.

are combined with a frantle misanthropy, like that of Romasan and Byron. But it is hardly possible to conceive a more fortunate mortal than him that is presented of such powers along with such felicity in the exercise of them, and who unites the finest genius to a chegical, social disposition and an undiminished reliah for the putsuits and amusements of ordinary life. He is a great poet grafted upon the excellent stock of a good-natized, 1977

"Byron continually reverts to Sir Walter Scott, and always in terms of admiration for his genius and affection for his good qualities: he says that he never gets up from the perusal of one of his works without finding himself in a better disposition, and that he generally reads his novels three times. "I find such a start of the same of the works." of his works without finding himself in a better disposition, and that he generally reads his novels three times. 'I find such a just mode of thinking, said Byron, 'that I could fill volumes with detached thoughts from Scott, all and each full of truth and beauty. Then, how good are his definitions? ... 'I think,' continued Byron, after a pause, 'that Scott is the only very successful genius that could be cited as being as generally beloved as a man as he is admired as an author; and, I must add, he deserves it; for he is so thoroughly good-natured, sincere, and honest, that he disarms the envy and jeatousy his extraordinary genius must excite. I hope to meet Scott once more before I die; for, worn out as are my affections, he still retains a strong hold of them."—Countess of Blessington's Concernations with Lord Byron.

when I last wrote, I was about to be introduced to Sir Walter Scott. He quite answered all my oxpectations of him; and you may suppose they were very high. His manners are those of an amiable and unaffected man and a polished gentleman, and his conversation is something higher, for it is often quite as anusing and interesting as his novels, and without any apparent attempt at display. It flows from him in the most easy and natural manner. As I take it for granted that the most insignificant particulars relating to such a man will be interesting to you, I will give you a description of his personal appearance, and even his dress. He is tail and well formed, excepting one of his ankles and foot, (I think the right.) which is crupiled and makes him walk very lamely. He is neither fat nor thin. His face is perfectly Scotch, and, though some people think it heavy, it atruck me as a very agreeable one. He never could have been handsome. His forehead is very high, his nose shoot, his upper lip long, and the lower part of his face very fleshy. His complexion is fresh and clear, his eyes very blue, shrewd, and ponetrating. I should say the predominant expression of his face is that of strong sense. His hair, which has always been very light, (as well as his eyebrows and cyclashes,) is now of a silvery whitoness, which makes him look somewhat older than he really is, (I believe forty-six is his age.) He was dressed in a brown frock-coat, blue trowsers, and had on a black cravat. . . . All the portraits I have seen are somewhat like him, but none of them very strongly so."—C. R. "Of the many portraits of him, Chantrey's bust is, to my mind, the most perfect. Lawrence gave him a pomposity of manner which he never assumed; but in Chantrey's bust the gentle turn of the head, inclined a little forwards and down, and the lurking humour in the eye and about the mouth, are Scott's own. Chantrey watched Sir Walter in company, and lavited him to breakfast previous to the sittings, and by these means caught the expression that was most characteristic."—C.

"The surliest critic must allow that Scott was a genuine man, which itself is a great matter. No affectation, fantuaticality, or distortion dwelt in him; no shadow of cant. Nay, withal, was he not a right brave and strong man, according to his kind? What a lead of toil, what a measure of felicity, he quietly bore along with him—with what quiet strength he both worked on hhe earth, and enjoyed in it; invincible to evil fortune and to good! A most composed invincible man; in difficulty and distress knowing no discouragement,—Samson-like, carrying off on his strong Samson-shoulders the gates that would imprison him:
—in danger and menace, laughing at the whisper of fear. And then, with such a sunny current of true humour and humanity, a free joyful sympathy with so many things:—what of fire he then, with such a sunny current of true humour and humanity, a free joyful sympathy with so many things:—what of fire he had all lying so beautifully latent, as radical latent heat, as fruitful internal warnath of life:—a most robust healthy man.

No sounder piece of British manhood was put together in that eightseath century of time. Alas! his fine Scotch fare, with its shaggy honesty, sagaitty, and goodness, when we saw it latterly on the Edinburgh streets, was all worn with care, the joy all fied from it.—ploughed deep with labour and sorrow. We shall never forget it; we shall never see it again. Adieu, Sir Walter, pride of all Scotchmen; take our proud and last farewell! "—Thomas Carlies: Low. and Westm. The MSS, had been the property of the late Mr. R. Cadell, the publisher, and were sold by order of his trustees, who desired to wind up his estate. Besides the MSS. of Scott's works, above maned, (several of which were more or less imperfect,) there were one hundred and one letters from Scott to dames Ballautyne, his printer and confidential friend, in reply to suggestions and criticisms on the works,—mone of which were suverelly purchased for the British Miseum. Writing from Wales, a correspondent of The Illustrated Times says,

"I started, as you know, from Euston square, and at the station I wont to the look-stall to buy one of Scott's novels,—authorized sixpenny edition. I expected to see a huge pilo stacked on the stall. I could not find one. 'Boy,' said I, 'where are the Scott novels?' 'Dou't keep them,' he replied.' Don't keep them! Why not?' 'Because if we did we should sell nothing else.' Here, then, to begin with, is a small fact worth reflecting upon. Some of these novels were first published more than fifty-six years ago; all have been in the hands of the public more than fifty-six years ago; all have been in the hands of the public more than thirty-five years, for Sir Walter died in 1832; and still they are so popular that an experienced bookseller is afraid to have them on his stalls, because if they were there nobody would buy any thing else. You will perhaps say, 'Surely the boy was chaffing.' Well, I thought so at first; but when ar every stall on the line I found that these novels were not kept, I came to the conclusion that the losy-poke the truth. Here, then, is an example of popularity I think quite unparalleled. Can you point to any other series of books, or even a single book, published from thirty-five to fifty years ago, a sixpenny edition of which Mr. Sunth would be afraid to expose on his stalls for fear the public would refuse to buy any thing else !'

"Perhaps it is not to be wondered at that Home should be the prominent idea in Miss Sedgwick's mind throughout a literary career which has made her natio dear to her country. Every novel and cosay and touching story that has ever falsas from her pen—we choose our words advisedly to express the graceful ease which characterizes her writings—has the throught of home, like a sweet undersong, beneath all the rich foliage of fancy and gleams of heroic feeling. Her heroines are rich in home qualities; her plots all revolve round the home centre; her hints touch gently or strongly on the sacrifices and errors that make home happy or miserable."—Mas. Sedley, Sir Charles, 1639-1701, a son of Sir John Sedley, Sir Charles, 1639-1701, a son of Sir John Sedley, of Aylesford, by Elizabeth, daughter of the famous Sir Henry Savile, Warden of Marton College, was entered Fellow Commoner of Wadhan College, in 1655 or 1656, and subsequently lived a country life until the Restoration, when he removed to London, and, says Wood,

"became a debanches, set up for a satyrical wit, a comedian, poet, and courtier of ladies, and I knownot what, and therefore remembered by an eminent poet [the Earl of Rochester] in these "Sedley has that prevailing, gentle art,"" &c. Athen. Oxon , Blins's ed., iv. 780.

Wood proceeds to give the unattractive particulars of that disgraceful riot by which Sedley and several of his companious were long remembered with disgust by the citizens of London. Sir Charles subsequently became a member of Parliament for New Romney, Kent. a warm promoter of the Revolution,-actuated, as he sarcastically professed, "from a principle of gratitude, For, since his majesty has made my daughter a Countess," he remarked, "it is fit I should do all I can to make his daughter a Queen."

Yet Vane could tell what ills from Beauty spring, And Sedley curs'd the form that pleased a king." Dr. Johnson's Vanity of Human Wishes.

But there seems to have been little in the "form" to please king or commoner. Catherine Sedley herself knew not what was the attraction that had made her Counters of Dorchester. "It cannot be my beauty," she said. for he must see that I have none; and it cannot be my wit, for he has not enough to know that I have any."

Selden, John, December 16, 1584-November 30, 1654, one of the most learned men whem England has produced, a native of Salvington, near Worthing, Sussex, was educated at Hart Hall, Oxford; when about ninetcen, was admitted a member of Clifford's Inn, and in 1604 removed to the Inner Temple. In 1621 he was imprisoned for five weeks as the instigator of the offensive protestation of the House of Commons respecting the Rights and Privileges of the Subjects, (pub. Lon., 1842, 4to;) in the last Parliament of James I. (1623) first appeared in the House, being returned for Lancaster; in the first (1625) and second (1626) Parliaments of Charles I. sat for Great Bedwin; in the third Parliament (1628) represented Ludgershall, and was one of the nine members of this body who for their opposition to the Court were (in 1622) imprisoned in the Tower on a charge of sedition. In 1840 he took a seat, as member for the University of Oxford, in the Long Parliament, where, as during the rest of his life, he distinguished himself by his moderation, and was honoured by the respect and confidence of many members of all parties. 1643 he was a lay incinber of the Assembly of Divines, took the Covenant, and was appointed by Parliament Chief Keeper of the Rolls and Records in the Tower; in 1645 was one of the twelve commoners selected to be Commissioners of the Admiralty, and was chosen, but declined the office, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge; and in 1616 he was voted £3000 for his sufferings and services during the third Parliament of Charles I. His latter years were spent and his death occurred at the Carmelite or White Fryers, the house of Elizabeth, Countess Downger of Kent, whose estates he managed, and to whom Aubrey, a contemporary, declares he was married:

"He never owned the marlage with the countesse of Kent till
"He was vary tall. "He never owned the mariage with the countesse of ment unafter her death, upon some laws account... He was very tell, I guesse about 6 foot high, sharpe ovall face, head not very big, long nose, inclining to one side, full popping cic, (gray.) He was a poet, and Sir John Suckling brings him in the 'Session of the Poeta,' " &c.—Aubrey's MSN. Biss's Wood's Athen. Oron., iii. 375, (q.v. for an elsborate account of Selden and his writings: other authorities will be cited below.)

"This subject has recently been treated with very great learning and admirable impartiality by an American author, Mr. Henry C. Lea, in his 'History of Nacordotal Celibacy,' (Philadelphia, 1867), which is certainly one of the most valuable works that America has produced. Since the great history of Dean Milman, I know no work in English which has thrown more light on the moral condition of the middle ages, and none which is more fitted to dispel the gross illusions concerning that period which positive wribers, and writers of a certain ecoleshastical school, have compired to sustain."—W. The reprint (1680) was attacked by Dr. Thomas Comber. See Bp. Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., 142; Athen. Oxon., iii. 369; Cunningham's Biog. Hist. of Eng., iii. 284. Even King James pointed out obnoxious passages in the work; and the author was cited (Dec. 1618) before the High Commission. The pressure was too strong: Selden recanted. See Kelhan, Rosent, No. 3. The 2d ed. of Fleta is the best; but the best contains many errors. A new ed., well annotated, would handsomely pay some lawyer's "debt to his profession." To Flets is added an anonymous French assay, (on the Practice of the Courts,) entitled Fet Assavoir. The first of the six books was pub. separately in 1735, fol.; see Clarke, Sir Saruel. It is an exposition (partly based an Glarvil and Bracton) of the English law, with the practice of the courts, the forms of writs, and the st planation of law-terms. In 1389 Edward I. imprisoned Thomas de Weylond, chief justice, and soveral other judges, for alleged "foul practices." One or more of these is supposed to have been incarcerated in the Fleet, (though the chronicles say they were committed to the Tower,) and enforced leisure was well employed in the production of this excellent treaties. Such is the accepted theory; and Selden (Dissert ad Flet., cap. z.) gives substantial reasons for sasigning the work to the reign of Edward I. But, on the other hand, Sir Edward Coke (Pref. to Rep., lib. 8) and Dr. Cowel (Interp., vos. Fleta) are satisfied that Fleta was composed in the latter years of Edward II. or the early years of Edward III. One of the last-printed opinions on the subject is that of a late Lord Chancellor, recently deceased:

of a late Lord Chancellor, recently deceased:

"Fleta must have been written after the thirteenth year of the King, [Edward L.,] and not much later; for it frequently quotes the staints of Westminster the second, without reforring to the later staints of the reign... Fleta and Britton, though inferior in style and arrangement to Bracton, are webderful performances for such an are, and make the practitioners of the present day, who are bewildered in the midst of an immense legal library, only the good fortune of their predecessors, who in a few manuscript volumes, copied by their own hand and constantly accompanying them, could speedily and clearly discover all that was known on every point that night arise."

"This very short and small volume gives perhaps a more exalted notion of Selden's natural talents than any of his learned writings. . . These sayings, . . on the whole, are full of vigour, raciness, and a kind of scorn of the half-learned, far less rade, but more cutting, than that of Scaliger. It has been said that the Table-Talk of Selden is worth all the Aus of the Continent. In this I should be disposed to concur; but they are not exactly works of the same class."—Hallan: Let. and especially Mr. Singer's Blog. Preface. In addition to the above works, and a few minor pieces, Selden left several MSS., (see Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., iii. 375; Biog. Brit., vi. 3623, CCC,) some of which—A Vindica-tion of the Aucient Way of Parliament in England— were pub. with Nathaniel Bacon's Historical Discourse of the Uniformity of the Government of Eugland, (5th and best ed., 1760, 4to;) and Wood says he had a great hand in the edition of the translation (Thomas North's) of Plutarch's Lives which was pub. Camb., 1657, fol. collective edition of his works, in three vols., bound in six vols. folio, (some l. p.,) appeared London, 1726:— Opera Omnia tam edita, quam incdita, in tribus volumi-nibus, collegit ac reconsuit Vitam Auctoris, Prefationes et Indices adject David Wilkins, S.T.P., (cum effigie.) Vol. i. consists of the treatises on the Jewish history and economy; vol. ii. contains Latin tracts on history and jurisprudence, letters and poems; vol. iii. is occupied with his English works. The student is referred to The Lives of John Selden, Esq., and Archbishop Usher, with Notices of the Principal English Men of Letters with whom they were connected, by John Aikin, M.D., Lon., 1811, 8vo, 1812, 8vo, (see Fosteriana, 1838, 188;) and the article in the Biographia Britannica, (1763, vi. 3605— 3624,) with the sources on which it relies, should not be neglected. Usher's Life and Letters, Works of John Memoirs, Blount's Cine and Letters, works of John Greaves, Clarendon's Life, Burnet's Reformation, Lloyd's Memoirs, Blount's Cons. Celeb. Authorum, Twell's Life of Pocock, the General Dict., Chalmers's Biog. Dict., Whitelocke's Swedish Embassy, Nichols's Lit. Ancc., Aubrey's Letters of Eminent Persons, 1813, 3 vols. 8vo, and Brit. Crit., vol. xli., all contain notices of this very distinguished scholar. There is also a much later work, called Memoirs of John Selden, with Notices of the Political Contest during his Time, by George W. Johnson, 1835, 8vo. This volume we have not seen: the critic of the London Athenseum (1836, 286) does not seem to value it. In general, Sciden's Latin style is far from

"As to his writings, his style is universally condemned. Budd [Buddeus] has well observed that it is a melange of all that is bad, as well as all that is good, in the Latin language. Le Clerc complains of the trouble caused to the reader by his obscurity as well as the perplexity of his method, of which he has given a remarkable histance. We have given another in the article of Sir Henry Spelman; and a third is superadded, by a mistake, in the tieneral bictionary."—Biog. Bril., vi. 3024.
"His style in all his writings seems hard, and sometimes obscure; which is not wholly to be imputed to the abstract subjects of which he commonly treated, out of the paths trod by other men, but to a little undervaluing the beauty of a style, and too much propensity to the language of antiquity: but in his conversation he was the most clear discourser, and had the best faculty in making hard things easy and present to the understanding, of any man that hath been known."—Earl of Clarkynow: Idic.

Charmonn: Ide.

"He was a man of very great learning, extremely well versed in the Jewish laws and antiquities; the Oriental languages were, familiar to hin; and the works which he has published upon the Greek antiquities demonstrate that his knowledge was as aminent in this way as in the antiquities of Scripture; but he is a negligent, obscure; and perpluxed writer. He often leaves the matter in hand, and falls into digressions; and there is very little order or method in his works."—Accounting Calmer.

In his description of the mixed Assembly of divines and laymen, "like Jews and Christians in a ship together," John Cleaveland thus notices our author:

"And Selden is a galliard by himself,
And well may be; there's more Divines in him
Than in all this their Jewish Sanhedrim."

To quote more testimonials to the extent of his erudition would not be difficult. Grotius calls him the glory of the English nation; and Grotius had well weighed his honoured rival :

Hence sprung that profound knowledge in the Latin, Greek, Hebrow, Rabbinical, Syriac, and Arabic tongue; as also his perfect acquaintance with all parts of philosophy, and of the laws both divine and human."—Theor. "Mr. Selden was a person whom no character can flatter, or tranguit in any agenesates."

"Mr. Selden was a person whom no character can flatter, or transmit in any expressions equal to his merit and virtue. He was of such stupendous learning in all kinds and in all languages, as may appear from his excellent and transcendent writings, that a man would have thought he had been entirely conversant a man would have thought he had been entirely conversant among books, and had never spent an hour but in reading and writing; yet his humanity, convreys, and affablity were such, that he would have been thought to have been bred in the best courts, but that his good nature, charity, and delight in doing good and in communicating all he knew exceeded that breeding."—Earl of Clarendon, (his intimate friend for many years:) Life.

Such was the great Salden: such his public services.

Such was the great Selden: such his public services, his many virtues, his vast accomplishments. Did he place his trust, did he find his happiness, in these?—or had he learned "a more excellent way"? He shall answer for himself:

"I have taken much pains to know every thing that was esteemed worth knowing among men; but, with all my disquisitions and readings, nothing more remains with me to comfort me, at the close of life, but this passage of St. Paul, 'It is a faithful saying, worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sluners.' To this I cleave, and herein I find rest!"

When he was dying, he said to Archbishop Usher,

When he was dying, he said to Archbishop Usher,
"I have surveyed most of the learning that is among the sons of men, and my study is filled with books and manuscripts [he had 80,00 volumes in his library] on various subjects; but at present I cannot recollect any passage out of all my books and papers whereon I can rest my soul, save this from the sa-red Scriptures: 'The grace of God that bringeth salvation bath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.'—[72, il. 11-14.]"

Settle, Elkanah, 1648-1723-4, a native of Dunstable, Bedfordshire; entered of Trinity College, Oxford, 1666; came to London probably in the next year, and spent the rest of his life as an author and politician. He acquired some reputation by his tragedies of Cambyses, (Lon., 1671, '72, '75, '92, 4to,) Herod and Mariamne, (1673, 4to,) The Empress of Morocco, (1673, 4to,) and other dramatic pieces and poems and political pamphlets, but lost more, in the long run, by his squables with Dryden,—in whose life (p. 523, supra) we have already introduced "The City Poet" to the reader. The Empress of Morocco, 1673, 4to, said to be the first play in the English language which was illustrated by engravings, (see Scott's Life of Dryden,) is very rare, and was priced in 1859 £2 5s. Accounts of his works and his quarrels—neither of sufficient importance to he detailed here—will be found in Athen. Oxon.; Johnson's, (see Cunningham's ed.,) Maloné's, and Scott's Dryden; Biog. Dramat.; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; Spence's Anec.; Disracli's Quar-rels of Authors and Calam. of Lit. See, also, Lon. Gent. Mag., 1850, ii. 367. In the decline of life he composed drolls for a booth in Bartholomew Fair, and, in the farce of St. George for England, represented a dragon, enclosed in a case of leather of his own invention: hence Dr. Young:

Poor Elkanah, all other changes past,
For bread in Smithfield dragons hiss'd at last, Spit streams of fire to make the butchers gape, And found his manners suited to his shape." Epistle to Alexander Pope.

Subsequently he gained admission into the Charter-House, (so graphically described by Washington Irving,) and there died. His great rival—for at one time Settle was a rival of the author of The Hind and Panther thus takes off Settle's literary characteristics:

"Doeg, though without knowing how or why,
Made still a blundering kind of melody,
Spurr'd boldly on, and dash'd through thick and thin,
Through sense and nonsense, never out nor in;
Free from all meaning, whether good or bad,
And, in one word, heroically mad,"

"Reader, if you are not acquainted with it, I would recommend to you allow all Church Narratives to read Sewel's History of the Quakers. It is in folio, and is the abstract of the Journals of Fox and the primitive French. . . . Here is nothing to stagger you, nothing to make you mistrust, no suspicion of alloy, no drop or drug of the worldly or ambitions spirit."— Charles Lama: Elia: A Quaker's Meeting.

Seymour, Anne, Margaret, and Jane, daughters of Edward Seymour, first Duke of Somerset, (infra.) are said to have composed a century of Latin distichs on the death of Margaret de Valois, Queen of France, on the death of Margaret de Valois, Queen of France, which were trans. into French, Greek, and Italian, and printed at Paris, in 1551, under the title of Le Tombeau de Marguerite de Valois, Royne de Navarre. Anne married, first, the Earl of Warwick, secondly, Sir Edward Hunton; the other two died single. There are reasons for doubting the authorship ascribed to these ladies: compare Bellard's Memoirs, 140, and Park's Walpole's M. Authors, t. 293-4. Seymour, Charles, Duke of Somerest. Seymour, Michael Hobart, brother of Agron Crossley Hobart Seymour, (supra,) and also a native of Ireland, after graduating at Trinity College, Dublin, held several curacies in Ireland, where he became very unpopular in consequence of his attacks upon the dogmas and practices of the Church of Rome. Removing to England, he officiated for several years as Evening Lecturer at St. George the Martyr, Southwark, and Afternoon Lecturer at St. Ann's, Blackfriars. After his marringe with Maris, Baroness Brounmill, he removed to Bath, with Maria, Baroness Brounmill, he removed to Isain, where he has since resided, without any preferment. Otway, of his contemporaries, and Sir Walter Scott, Otway, of his contemporaries, and Sir Walter Scott, (see his Essay on the Drama, and Lockhart's Scott, ch. xviii., n.,) among later critics, may be ranked with the admirers of Shadwell's natural abilities. See Laughaine's Dram. Writers: Biog. Brit.: Biog. Dramat.: Malone's Dryden; Cibber's Lives: Nichols's Poems: Austin and Ralph's Lives of the Poets-Laureate; Lon. Athen., 1853, 637; Blackw. Mag., ix. 280, 282. Shadwell was a warm admirer of Ben Jonson's dramatic powers, and perhaps as much overvalued his own abilities (see his Prefaces to Psyche, Timon of Athens, &c.) as they were undervalued by Dryden. But he was by no means so self-reliant as to scorn to profit from his predecessors. The Sullen Lovers, The Royal Shepherdess, Psyche, The Libertine, Timon of Athens, The Miser, The True Widow. The Squire of Alsatia, Bury Fair, and The Scowrers, all strut the stage in horrowed plumes. Fortunately, Mr. Thomas Scott (see Lockhart's Scott, ut supra) abandoned his unwise design of a new edition of the works of this indecent playwright. A more honourable monument to his memory is the one erected in Westminster Abbey by his son, Sir John Shadwell.

"I can vouch," remarks an eminent antiquary, upon whom the grave has recently closed, "for the following forms, all taken from writings of nearly the poet's own age..."
"Shaksper, Schaksper, Schakspere, Shakspere, "These are all manifestiv of the same type; and to these varieties others might be added. In two instances I have met with the name written Stepere... Shakspere or Shakspere kept its ground as the received and proper orthography of the poet's name till the time of the two very eminent commentators Steveres and Malone. In an evil hour they agreed, for no apparent reason, to abolish the s in the first syllable, so that if the orthography is to represent the pronunciation, or the pronunciation to be conformable with the orthography, the name should be pronounced as in the second of the three modes above mentioned. A contemporary critte of inferior mote in 1785 introduced another variation. In his hands the name became Shakspere, with the oligert, no doubt, of bringing back the orthography to the form in which the name is said to be found traced by the poet's own hand in his will and in other writings."—

Mr. Hunter's "inferior critic" is John Pinkerton, and the book referred to his Letters of Literature, by Robert Heron, 1783, &c., 8vo. But Sir Frederick Madden is not to be thus designated; and his Observations on an Autograph of Shakspere, and the Orthography of his Name, 1838, 8ve, is thus commented on by one of the most cautions of modern critics:

"Though I shall not innovate in a work of this kind, not particularly relating to Shakspeare, I must observe that Sir Frederick Madden has offered very specious reasons (in the Archaelogia, vol. xxvii.) for believing that the poet and his family spelt their name Shakspere, and that there are at least no exceptions in his own antographs, as has commonly been supposed. A copy of Florio's translation of Montaigne, a book which he had certainly read, (see Malone's note on Tempost, act ii, scene i.,) has been lately discovered, with the name W. Shakspere clearly written in it; and there seems to be no reason to doubt that it is a genuine signature. This book has very properly been placed in the British Museum, among the choice resumbate of that repository."—HALLAM: Lil. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1845, ii. 175, n. ii. 175, n.

In 1869 Mr. Joseph Burtt, in a letter to the London Times, gives an ageount of a supposed newly-discovered autograph of Shakspeare pasted in an Amsterdam edition, 1630, r. 32mo, of the works of Ovid; and in the same year (1869) Mr. Michel Chasles was aband over one hundred MS letters permying to purchased over one hundred MS. letters purporting to twelve of his sonnets. We need hardly add that M. Chasles's papers, at least, are manifest forgeries. (See Amer. Lit. Gaz., Oct. 15, 1869, 374: letter from Paris, Sept. 15, 1869.) Of the four forms exhibited at the commencement of this article, the first is now seldom seen: for the use of each of the others we cite several authorities as representatives of their respective schools:

ways of spelling the name.

As we are obliged to select one of the thirty-two modes thus cited, or to hunt up a new method from the archives of the past, we shall perhaps exercise a becoming modesty by following Mr. Hallam in the use of the ordinary form,-SHAKSPEARE.

And we know not that we could better introduce the brief biographical sketch of our illustrious subject, which we contemplate, than by the citation of a few lines from the same judicious authority:

we contemplate, than by the citation of a few lines from the same judicious authority:

"Of William Shakspeare, whom, through the mouths whom he has inspired to body forth the modifications of his immense mind, we seem to know better than any human writer, it may be truly said that we scarcely know any thing. We see him, so far as we do see him, not in himself, but in a reflex image from the objectivity in which he was manifested: he is Falstaff, and Mercutio, and Malvolio, and Jaques, and Portia, and Imagen, and Lear, and othello; but to us he is scarcely a determined person, a substantial reality of past time, the man Shakspeare. The two greatest names in poetry are to us little more than names. If we are not yet come to question his unity, as we do that of 'the blind old man of Scio's rocky isle,'—an improvement in critical acuteness doubtless reserved for a distant posterity, —we as little feel the power of identifying the young man who came up from Stratford, was afterwards an indifferent player in a London theatre and retired to his native place in middle life, with the author of Macbeth and Lear, as we can give a historic personality to Homer. All that insatiable curlosity and unwearled diligences have bitherto detected about Shakspeare serves rather to disappoint and perplex us than to farnish the slightest illustration of his charactor. It is not the register of his baptism, or the draft of his will, or the orthography of his name, that we seek. No letter of his writing, no record of his conversation, no character of him drawn with any fulness by a contemporary, has been produced."

These observations, published by Mr. Hallam in the first edition of his Introduction to the Literature of Europe, in 1837-39, are but an amplification of the oftquoted lines of Goorge Steevens, written in 1780:

"All that is known with any degree of certainty concerning Shakspeare is—that he was born at Stratford-upon-Avon-mar-ried and had children there—went to London, where he com-menced actor, and wrote poems and plays—returned to Stratford, made his will, died, and was buried."

In a note appended to the foregoing, dated 1842, Mr. Hallam adds,

Hallam adds,
"I am not much inclined to qualify this paragraph in consequence of the petty circumstancer relating to Shakayeare which have been lately brought to light, and which rather confirm than otherwise what I have said. But I laud the labours of Mr. Collier, Mr. Hunter, and other collectors of such crumbs; though I am not sure that we should not venerate Shakayeare as much if they had left him undisturbed in his obscurity. To be told that he played a trick to a brother player in a licentious amonr, or that he died of a drunken frolic, as a stupid vicar of Stratford recounts (long after the time) in his diary, [see Diary of Rev. John Ward, &c., 1648-1679, 8vo, 1839.] does not exactly inform us of the man who wrote Loar. If there was a Shakayeare of carth, as I susject, there was also one of heaven; and it is of him that we desire to know something."—Vol. ii., Part 2, chap, vi. chap, vi.

Perhaps Mr. Hallam does scant justice to the Shak-spearian archeologists; but this is a matter which she intelligent reader must decide for himself; and our duty will be best discharged-not by a hopeless attempt at a digest of the vast mass of materials which patient in-dustry has given to the world, but—by an indication of the best sources of knowledge upon a subject which seems to be daily assuming increasing importance in the eyes of English and foreign students.

John Shakspeare, the poet's father, has been variously represented as a butcher, a dealer in wool, a glover, and a landed proprietor and cultivator, and may have combined these callings, or have followed them at different

His wife, the poet's mother, was Mary, daughter of Robert Arden, of Wilmesote, and a descendant of a very aucient family. Mr. John T. Burgess states (in London Athoneum, 1867) that Turchill, a Saxon earl of the time of William the Conqueror, was the ancestor of the Ardeig family, which is probably descended from Alfred the Great. Mr. George Russell French, in a letter to the editors of the "Cambridge Shakespeare," (W. G. Clark and W. A. Wright.) announces that in the preparation of his Genealogical Notices of the Shakspeare and Arden families he has found the link which unites Shakepeare with the Ardens of Warwickshire. The results of these researches were promised for the supplementary volumes of the "Cambridge Shakespeare." See Shakespeareana Genealogica, Compiled by G. R. French, Macmillan, 1869, 8vo.

It is presumed that William was a student at the free school of Strutford; and after leaving this academy be seems to have acted as assistant to his father. What other occupation he found, we know not: Aubrey calls him a schoolmaster; Malone, a lawyer's clerk; Rowe, a wool-stapler or butcher. Whatever may have been his profession, its duties were not so engrossing as to exclude all thoughts of the tender passion which he has so well portrayed; for when he was eighteen years and a half old be was married to Aune Hathaway, of the hamlet of Shottery, parish of Stratford, then in her twenty sixth year. In the absence of all contemporaneous or later evidence on the subject, Mr. De Quincey (life of Shakspeare, in Encyc. Brit.) is so kind as to favour us with a circumstantial account of the courtship, which makes the lady the suitor, and an anxious suitor.

In 1386 or 1387, as is supposed, he left Stratford for London,—whether driven from home for meddling with Sir Thomas Lucy's deer, or otherwise, is vehemently contested by antiquaries. In 1589 he was a joint pro-prietor in the Blackfriars Theatre; before 1592 he was well known as an actor and as a playwright; and in 1593 he published his poem of Venus and Adonis, which he thus dedicates to Lord Southampton:

"I know no; how I shall offend in dedicating my unpolished lines to your lord-hip, nor how the world will censure me for choosing so strong a prop to support so weak a burden; only if your honour seems but pleased, I account myself highly praised, and yow to take advantage of all allo hours till I have honoured you with some graver labour. But if the first heir of my invention provided determed, I shall be sorry it had so noble a god-father, and never after our so haven a lead for fore it wild hone vomino prove determed, I shall be sorry it had so noble a god-father, and never after car so barren a land, for fear it yield me still so bad a harvest. I leave it to your honourable sarrey, and your honour to your heart's content, which I wish may always answer your own and the world's hopeful experiation."

The modest apprehensions of the author proved to be unfounded: the "land" was most fertile, the harvest luxuriant. Lucrece-to continue the enumeration of his poems-was published in 1594; The Passionate Pilgrim, in 1599; the Sonnets, in 1609. As regards the dates of the composition of his plays, much diversity of opinion exists. We give three tables, on the authority of as many eminent critics:

Drake rejects what, he remarks, "has very improperly, in modern times, been ascribed to Shakepeare as the First Part of his King Henry the Sixth. The spuriousness Part of his King Henry the Sixth. The spuriousness of this part, indeed, has been so satisfactorily proved by Mr. Malone that no doubt can be supposed any longer to rest on the subject," (Shaksp. and his Times, ii. 292;) and he admits Perieles. Of course he rejects Titus Andronious. But this, as well as Pericles, is included in the editions of Shakepeare Plays; making, with the thirty-five in Maloue's and Chalmers's lists, thirty-seven in all.

editions of Shakspeare Plays; making, with the thirty-five in Maloue's and Chainers's light, thirty-seven in all.

"It is generally believed that he had much to do with the tragedy of Poricles, which is now printed among his works, and which external testimony—though we should not rely too much on that us to Shakspeare—has assigned to him; but the play is fall of ordent marks of an inferior hand. Its data is unknown. Drake supposes it to have been he carliest work, [1594], rather from its inferiority than on any other ground. Tims Andronicus is now by common connent douled to be in any sense a production of Shakspeare; very few passages, I should think not one, resemble his manner."—Hallak: Lil. Hist. of Europe, vol. il. chap. vl.. (q. v.)

"The external evidence that Titus Andronicus was written by Shakspeare is decisive; it is printed in the folio collection, which does not contain one other doubtful play; it is summorated by Mores, in 1598, as a play of Shakspeare's. Percles is not printed in the folio collection, and is not mentioned by Mercs; into there of Shakspeare's contemporaries attributed it to him. The internal evidence, in many respects, will assign Pericles to him. This is a question which has recoved much expectil examination, and which requires much more."—Charles Knour: Instarript to vol. vi. of his Protrial ed. of Shakspeare, Dec. 21, 1841.

"Mores was personally acquainted with the post, and so very intinately that the latter read over to him his sonuets before they were printed. I cannot conceive that all the critical sceptics in the world would ever be able to get over such a testimory."—Schlegel's Dramat. Lit., Loct. XXVI.

The researches of recont investigators exhibit plausible hands a such a testimory."

The researches of recent investigators exhibit plausible hypotheses which dispute, in some cases well-sustained evidence which disproves, some of the dates in the preceding table, (see remarks upon the chronology of plays, in Edin. Rev., July, 1840, 471-76;) but a critical examination of a subject of such uncertainty and vast examination of a subject of such uncertainty and vast extent will be readily excussed by the general reader. The Seven Doubtful Plays of Shakspeare, so called, are: I. Pericles, 1609, 4to. II. These, with Additional Observations, and the Genuine Poems of Additional Observations, and the Genuine Poems of Shakspears, were published together, with Notes by the Editor [Edmund Malone] and others, in 2 vols. 8vo, in 1780, as a Supplement to the 2d edition of Johnson and Steevens's edition of Shakspeare's Plays, 1778, 10 vols. 8vo. Arden of Feversham, 1592, 4to, Edward the Third, 1596, 4to, and other plays, have also been ascribed to Shakspeare; and the Two Noble Kinsmen, 1634, 4to, bears the names of John Fletcher and William Shakspeare; and The Birth of Merlin, printed 1662, is ascribed in the title-page to William Shakspeare and William Rowley. A number of other plays, &c., which need not be particularly noticed, have sought the protection of the same great name. Mr. William Gilmore Simus, of South Carolina, published in one volume, 8vo, New York, 1848, A Supplement to the Plays of Shakspeare, comprising the Seven Dramas which have been ascribed to his pen, but which are not included with his Writings in Modern Editions; edited, with Notes and an Intro-duction to each Play. In 1605 he purchased a molety of the tithos of Stratford, and the few last years of his life were spent in the handsomest house (New Place) of that beautiful town; where, says towe, "his Place) of that beautiful town; where, says Rowe, pleasurable wit and good nature engaged him in the acquaintance, and entitled him to the friendship, of the gentlemen of the neighbourhood." "Every one agrees that during the last three or four years of his life Shakapers ceased to write. Yet we venture to think that every one is in error. The opinion is founded upon a helief that he only finally left London towards the close of 1613. We have shown, from his purchase of a large house at Stratford, his constant acquisition of landed property there, his active esgagements in the business of agriculture, the interest which he took in matters connected with his property in which his neighbours had a common interest, that he must have partially left London before this period. There were no circumstances, so far as we can collect, to have prevented him finally leaving London several years leave 1612. . . When the days of leisure arrived, is it reasonable to believe that the more habit of his life would not ert its ordinary control,—that the greatest of intellects would suddenly sink to the condition of an every-day sen, cherishing no high plans for the fature, looking back with no desire to equal and excel the work of the past?... The marvelious accuracy, the real substantial learning, of the three Roman plays of Shakspere, present the most complete evidence to our minds that they were the result of a profound study of the whole range of Roman history, including the nicer details of Roman manners, not in those days to be acquired in a compendious form, but to be brought out by diligent reading sione. It is pleasant to believe that the last years of Shakspere's life were those of an earnest student. We confidently ask if the tellof he not a reasonable one?"—Charles Knighr: William It is pleasant to believe that the last years of Shakapere's life ware those of an earnest student. We confidently ask if the belief be not a reasonable one?"—Charles Knight: William Shakapere: a Biography, ed. 1861, 305, 306, 307.

53d birthday,—and on the 25th was buried on the north side of the chancel of the great church of Stratford.

"Whatever was the immediate cause of his list illuess, we may well believe that the closing scene was full of tranquillity and hope; and that he who had sought, perhaps more than any other man, to look beyond the material and finite things of the world, should rest at last in the 'peace which passeth all understanding,—in that assured belief which the opening of his will have expressed with far more than formal solemnity: 'I commend my soul into the hands of God my Creator, hoping and assuredly believing, through the only merits of Jesus Christ my Saviour, to be made partaker of life everlasting,'"—CHARLES KNOST: ubd supra, 317.

As regards the immediate family of the great poet, we can offer nothing more pertinent than the following:

As regards the immediate family of the great poet, we can ofter nothing more pertinent than the following:

"Mr. Landor, with a generous sway of blood, has written a letter to the newspapers on a sin under which the nation is said to the,—the sin of ingratude. A descendant of Slakepeare alive and starving! To the rescue, for very shame! Such is the watery of the generous area of lath. But Mr. Landor's emotions are of that lively kind which cannot wait the calm justification of facts. Little as we know of Shakepeare, we know with above. and stativing. To the result, for every statute: Such is the watery of the generous sage of Bath. But Mr. Landor's emotions are of that lively kind which cannot wait the calm justification of facts. Little as we knew of Shakspeare, we know with absolute certainty that he has no descendant now alive. Mr. J. O. Halliwell has put the circumstances conveniently together in an answer to the cry for new subscriptions: 'At Shakspeare's death in 1616 his family consisted of his wife, his daughter Susanas, married to Dr. Hall, his daughter Judith, married to Thomas Quinny, and Elizabeth Hall, a granddaughter, the only child of Susanas Bakspeare. Judith Quincy had several chidren, who were all dead as early as the year 1839, leaving no issue, she herself surriving till 1642. The poet's granddaughter, Elizabeth Hall, was married in 1626 to Thomas Nash, who died in 1647 without issue; and secondly, in 1649, to John Barnard, afterwards Sir John Bainard, of Abington, county of Northsupton, by whom she had no family. Lady Barnard died in 1870, leaving no children, so that with her the lineal descent from Shakspeare expired. There may, however, be descendants fron the Shakspeare eminity still living, derlying their genealogy from Joan, the poet's sister, who married William Hart of Strafford. Joan and hor sons are kindly mentioned in the poet's will. The pedigree is not complete, and there is only a descent from the second son, Thomas, to whose son Thomas, with a remainder to his brother George, the birthplace and adjoining premises at Stratford were bequeathed by Endy Barnard in 1669. These continued in the postession of the tamily for upwards of a centery. About fifty years ago the Harts removed to Tewkeebury, where, in 1848, resided Thomas Shakspeare liart, the eighth in descent from the sister of the great dramatist. Some years ago we saw these Harts at their house near Tewkeebury. They were very poor. The descendant of Joan Shakspeare was a rush-chair mender. If Mr. Landor pleases to get up subscriptions for the tush-work

We learn, from a volume published in the year in which we write,—Shakespearenna Genealogica, Compiled by G. R. French, Lon., 1869, 8vo, that George Hart, the ninth in descent from William Hart, who in 1599 married the poet's sister Joan Shakspeare, emigrated to Australia in 1864. The name Shakspeare frequently occurs in the Hart family.

Mr. Southey had set Mr. Landor as example of his loose way of writing:

10000 way of writing:

"The descendants of Shakspeare are living in poverty, and in the lowest condition of life."—Southey's Colloquies, it. 312.

But let us take a look at Howitt's "descendant of Yoan Shakspeare:"

"As I went to Shottry I met with a little incident which interested use greatly by its unexpectedness. As I was about to pass over a stile, at the end of Stratford, into the fields leading to that "lines. I saw the master of the national school mustering his over a stile, at the end of Stratford, into the fields leading to that village, I saw the master of the national school mustering his scholars to their tasks. I stopped, being pleased with the look of the old man, and said, 'You seem to have a considerable number of lade hore; shall you raise another Shakspeare from among them, think you?' 'Why,' replied the master,' I have a Shakspeare now in the school.' I knew that Shakspeare had no descendants beyond the second generation, and I was not aware that there was any of his family remaining. But it seems that the pasterity of his sister, Joan Hart, who is mentioned in his will, yet exists; part under her marriage-name of Hart, at Tawkesbury, and a family in Stratford, of the name of Smith. "A have a Shakspeare here,' add the master, with evident pride and pleasure. 'Here, boys, here? He quickly mustered has ladded troop in a row, and eads to me, 'There now, sir, can you tell which is a Shakspeare?' I glenced my eye along the line, and, instantify fixing it on one boy, said, 'That is the Shakspeare; 'Tou are right,' said the meater, 'that is the Shakspeare; the Shakspeare cast of countenance is there. That is William Shakspeare Smith, a lineal descendant of the poets sister.'... It sounded oddly enough, as I was passing along the street in the evening, to hear some of the same school-boys say to one another. That is the gentleman who gave Sill Shakspeare sixpence."—Howert: Visits to Remarkable Places, i. 98-108, and repub., with additions, in his Homes and Haunts, i. See Athen., 1857, 855.

We may refer, in passing, to notices of Shakspeare's residences in Stratford, in Athen., 1857, 501, 1800. ii. 78, 1861, i. 432, 467, 561, ii. 446, 511, 545, 619, 729, 845, 1862, i. 465, ii. 612, 1863, i. 393, Harper's New Mon. Mag., Sept. 1861, Lon. Reader, 1863, i. 257, and Amer.

More detailed accounts of these objects of interest to the Shakespeare, and the standard will be found in great of the galaxy. speare student will be found in several of the works enumerated in our catalogue of Shakspeariana, (infra.)

In May, 1838, a copy of Florio's translation of Montaigne's Essays, 1603, fol., with an autograph of "Shekspere," (see Sir F. Madden's Essay, 1838, 8vo, above referred to.) was sold by Evans, of London, for £100; in June, 1858, an autograph signature of Shakspeare affixed to a mortgage-deed of a house in Blackfriars, dated March 11, 1612-13, was bought for the British Museum for £315, (see Athen., 1858, 1. 788;) and within the last for £315, (see Athen., 1888, 1. 788;) and within the last few years (i.e. on April 23, 1861) New Place, Strat-ford, was withdrawn from public sale, the price being limited to £1800, after a bid of £1100. Mr. Halliwell considers the property worth not far short of £1500 as an investment. (See Athen., 1861, i. 562.) The Garrick Shakspeare Cup was recently sold for about £50, and has been resold, it is affirmed, for £100. The enthusiasm for all that appertains to the great bard is largely shared in by Americans; yet we are compelled to admit that a in by Americans; yet we are compelled to admit that a reference to the Gazetteer confirms a statement which somewhat surprised us in Mr. Bartlett's Dictionary of Americanisms:

Americanisms:

"Distinguished men in English history, as Milton, Addison, Clarendon, Dryden, Scott, Byron, Chesterfield, Hume, Marlborough, Junius, have towns christened with their names. But little fondness is exhibited for dramatic authors, as the name of the greatest of them all has been forgotten: not even a pond, a hollow, or a swamp has been honored with the name of Shakspeare."—Introduc., xxii.

The leave sale of the proc's works in the United States.

The large sale of the poet's works in the United States, however, is perhaps a more honourable tribute to his genius than the adoption of his name for a village. But, now that Mr. Bartlett has called attention to this omission, we predict that it will soon be supplied. We now proceed to notice-

It is not, of course, intended to specify all of the Emirions, to cite all the Crimical Opinions, or to chronicle all of the Shakspeariana. For so extensive an exhibition neither our time nor our limits would suffice. In cach of the divisions, where no place of publication is designated, London will be understood. P. p., or p. p., signifies privately printed; s. a., sine anno; s. l., sine loco; f. p., fine paper; t. p., thick paper; l. p., large paper. Titles will be abbreviated as convenience may paper. After will be accreviated as convenience may suggest. We shall avail ourselves of the labours of our predecessors—Lowndes, Wilson, Halliwell, H. G. Bohn, (Lowndes's Bibl. Man., Pt. 8, 1863.) and others—as we may deem expedient; but we shall also add much new matter not before collected.

"About the excellence of these poems there can be no dispute. Next to the drams they are by far the most valuable of his works. They contain such a quantity of profound thought as must astonish every reflecting reader; they are anothered by splendid and delicate imagery; they are sublime, pathetic, tender, or sweetly playful; while they delight the ear by their fluency and their varied harmonies of rhythm. Our language can boast to sonnets altogether worthy of being placed by the side of Shakspeare's, except the few which Milton poured forth, so severe and so majestic."—Rev. A. Drec. "There is extant a small volume of miscellanceus poems in which Shakspeare expresses his feelings in his own person. But, from regard to the critic's own credit, he would not have writtened to talk of an Act of Parliament not being strong enough to compel the perusal of these, or any production of Shakspeare, if he lead not known that the people of England were ignorant of the treasures contained in those little pieces."—Wonnewers: Pref. to Parkical Works.

lient, Ksq., the author of the account:) Appendix to list. Mag., July, 1861, pp. 1-5.

"The first edition is the only one, in my opinion, worth regarding; and it is much to be wished that an edition of Shakspeare were given literatim according to the first follo; for by the presumptions heenee of the dwarfish commentators, who are forever cutting him down to their own size, we risk the loss of Shakspeare's genuine text, which that follo assuredly contains."—J. Horn's Tooks: Diversions of Partey.

"It is by courtesy alone that this follo can be termed an edition. Edited, in any proper sense of the word, it is not. The errors of the piniter, and the corruptions of the players, are put down to Shakspeare's account; nor is there probably any Latin or Greek manuscript more vitiated by sleepy and ignorant Louyists than this editio princeps has been by its publishers.

And this negligence is the more inexcusable and provoking because, according to general tradition. Shakspeare's autographs were models of calligraphy, and Henings and Coudell must have seen, and might therefore have printed from, them.

Bad as the editing was, the printing of this volume was no better. Versa is printed as prose, prose as versa. Priscipn's head is perpetually broken; words are omitted or transposed; the punctuation is such that had Dogberry and Verges turned compositors for the nonce, they could hardly have made it worse. Nor was advantage taken of a second edition to amend these gross, open, and paipable errors. Some glaring blunders are corrected in the second folio; but new blunders compensate for those which are removed."—Bentley's Lon. Quarterly, No. III. See, also, Cornhill Mag., Oct. 1867.

My answer hath beens' Would he had botted a thousand! which they thought a malevolent speech. I had not told posterity this, but for their ignorance who chose that circumstance to commend their friend by wherein he most fastled, and to justify mine own candour: for I loved the mun, and do knoom his memory, on this side idolatry, as much as any. That the "flights of the Sweet Swan of Avon" charmed the "Elizas" of humble life, we have early evidence. In his enumeration of English poets, Master John Johnson thus discourses of our author:

"There was also Shakespeere, who (as Capid informed mo) creeps into the women's closets about bed-time, and if it were not for some of the old out-of-date grandames (who are set over the rest as their tutoresses) the young sparkish girles would read in Shakespeere day and night," &c.—The Academy of Lore, describing the Folly of Younge Men and the Fallacy of Women, 1641, 410.

Aubrey was not born until nine years after Shakpeare's death; but he talked with the acquaintances of the poet, (see Aubert, John, p. 82, supra,) and left is some of the results of his investigations:

some of the results of his investigations:

"This William, being inclined naturally to poetry and acting, came to London, I guess, about 18, and was an actor at one of the play-houses, and did act exceedingly well. (Now, B. Jonson was never a good actor, but an excellent instructor.) He began early to make essays at dramatic poetry, which at that time was very low; and his plays took well. He was a handsome, well-shaped man, very good company, and of a very ready and pleasant smooth wit. The humour of a constable in 'A Midsummer Night's Bream' he happened to take at Grendon, in Bucks, which is the road from London to Strattord; and there was living that constable about 1642, when I first came to Oxon. Mr. Jos. Howe is of that parish, and knew hum. Ben Jonson and he did gather humours of men daily wheree they came.

He was wont to go to his native country once a year. I think I have been told that he left £200 or £300 per annum, there and Mr. Thomas Shadwell—who is accounted the best comedian we have now—ay that he left a most prodiguous wit, and did admire his natural parts beyond all other dramatical writers. He was wont to say that he never blotted out a line in his life. Said Ben Jonson, 'I wish he had blotted out a thousand.'"—

"Shake-pear, who, taught by none, did first impart
To Fletcher wit, to lab'ring Johnson art.
He, monarch-like, gave there his subjects law,
And is that nature which they paint and draw;
Fletcher reached that, which on his heights did grow.
While Johnson crept, and gathered all below:
This dad his love, and this his nurth digest,
One imitates him most, the other best.

If they have since outwrit all other men,
"Tis from the drops which fell from Shakspear's pen.
The storm which vanished on the neighb'ring shore
Was taught by Shakespear's Tempest first to roar.

"To begin, then, with Shakespear. He was the man, who, of all modern, and perhaps ancient poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul: all the images of nature were still spicesent to him, and he drew them, not isboriously, but luckly; when he describes any thing, you more than see it—you feel it, too. Those who accuse him to have wanted learning, give him the greater commendation: he was naturally learned; he needed not the spectacles of books to read nature,—he looked inwards and found her there. I cannot say he is everywhere alike: were he so, I should do him injury to compare him with the greatest of mankind. He is many times flat and insipid, his comic wit degenerating into clenches, his serious swelling into Lombast. But he is always great when some great occasion is presented to him; no man can say he ever had a fit subject for his wit, and did not then raise himself as high above the rest of poets.

The consideration of this made Mr. Histes, of Eton, say, that there was no subject of which any post ever wit, but he would produce it much better done in Elsakespear: and, however others are now generally preferred before him, yet the age wherein he lived, which had contemporaries with him Flotchey and Jonson, never equalled them to him in their esteem; and in the late of the courtiers. "The account of Shakespeare may stand as a perpetual model of emonisatic criticism; exact without minuteness, and lofty without exaggeration. The praise lavished by Longinus on the attestation of the heroes of Marathon by Demosthenes, fades away before it. In a few lines is exhibited a character so extensive in its comprehension and so curious in its limitations, that nothing can be added, dimentined, or reformed: nor can the editors and admirers of Shakespeare, in all their emulation of reverence, boast of much more than of laving diffused and paraphrased his epitone of exectlence; of having changed Dryden's gold for baser metal, of lower value though of greater bulk."—Dr. Jonsson: Life of Dryden.

"If ever any author deserved the name of an original, it was shakespeare. Home himself drew not his art so immediately from the fountains of nature; it proceeded through Egyptian strainers and channels, and came to him not without some tincture of the learning, or some cast of the models, of those hofore him. The poetry of Shakespeare was inspiration indeed: he is not so much an imitator as an instrument of Nature; and it is not so much an initator as an instrument of Nature; and it is not so just to say that he speaks from her, as that she speaks through him.

"His characters are so much nature herself, that it is a seit of highry to call them by so distant a name as copies of her. Those of other poets have a constant resemblance, which shows that they received them from one another and were but multipliers of the same mage; each picture, like a meck rambow, is but the reflection of a reflection. But every single character in Shakespeare is an unch as, individual as those in life itself; it is as impossible to find any two alike; and such as from their relation or affinity in any respect appear most to be twine, will, upon comparison, be found remarkably distinct. To the life and variety of character we must add the wonderful preservation of it; which is such throughout her plays, that had all the speeches been printed without the very names of the persons, I believe one might have applied them with certainty to every speaker.

speeches been printed without the very names of the persons, I believe one might have applied them with certainty to every speaker.

"The power over our passions was never possessed in a more eminent degree, or displayed in so different instances." Yet, all along, there is seen no labour, no pains to rake them; no preparation to guido or guess to the effect, or be perceived to lead towards it; but the heart swells, and the tears burst out, just at the proper places: we are surprised at the moment we weep; and yet, upon reflection, find the passion as just that we should be surprised if we had not wept, and wept at that vary moment. "How astonishing is it, again, that the passions directly opposite to these, laughter and spicen, are no less at his command that he is not more a master of the great than the reliculous in human nature; of our nodest tendernesses than of our valents folibles; of our strongest emotions, than of our iddeed sevantions? Nor does he only excel in the pussions; in the coolness of reflection and reasoning he is full as admirable. His sentiments are not only in general the most peritient and judicious upon every subject; but by a talent very peculiar, something between penetration and folicity, he his upon that particular point on which the bent of each argument turns, or the force of each motive depends. This is perfectly annusing, from a man of no education or experience in those great and public scenes of life which are usually the subject of his thoughts; so that he seems to have known the world, may be lorn, as well as the poet. It must be owned, that, with all these great excellences, he has almost as great defects; and that as he has certainly written better, so he has perhaps written worse, than any other."—Alex. "Shakespeare is, above all writers, at least above all modern writers, the poet of nature; the peet that holds up to his readers a faithful mirrour of manners and of life. His characters are not modified by the customs of particular places, unpractised by the rost of the world, by the posulatives of studies or profeasions, which can operate but upon small numbers, or by the accidents of translent fashions or temporary opinions: they are the genuine progeny of common humanity, such as the world will always supply and observation will always that. His persons act and spook by the influence of those general passions and pinch by with a life persons act and apook by the influence of those general passions and pinch by with a life perper to a character is too often an individual; in those of Shakespears it is commonly a species.

"It is from this wide extension of design that so much lastruction is derived. It is this which fills the plays of Shakespears with practical axioms and domestic wisdom. It was said of Shake-spears that from his works may be collected a system of civil and occommical praduces. Yet this real power is not shown in the spliculour of particular passages, but by the prograve of the property of the prodrive to recommend them by select quantitions will succeed like the pedant in Hierocles, who, when he offered his house to sale, carried a brick in his pecket as a specimen.

"It will not easily he imagened how much Shakespeare scele in accommodating his sentiments to real life, but by comparing him with other authors. It was observed of the ancient schools of dis handing there which he should ever meet it any other place. The same remark may be applied to every stage but that the succession of the place of the success of the succession of the prodrive of the success of the property of the success of the prodrive sentime its in human language, by scenes from which a hermit may estimate the transactions of the world, and a confessor predict the progress of the passions. . . As his personages act upon principles arising from genuine passion, very little medified by particular forms, their pleasures and vextions are communicable to all times and to all places; they are natural, and therefore durable. The adventitions peculiarities of personal labits are only superficial dyes, bright and pleasing for a little while, yet soon fading to a dim thict, without any remains of former lustre; but the discriminations of true passion are the colours of nature; they pervade the whole mass, and can only perish with the body that exhibits them. The accidental compositions of heterogeneous modes are dissolved by the chance which combined them; but the uniform simplicity of primitive qualities neither admits increase nor suffers decay. The sand heaped by one flood is scattered by another; but the rock always continues in its place. The stream of time, which is continually washing the dissoluble fabrics of other poets, passes without injury by the admiant of Shakeperre. The extracts last cited have not put the Shakspeare devotee in the best possible humour for weighing the vordict of David Hume, which follows; but, like Shakspeare, (according to Johnson,) at least in this, we have "no heroes" in this book, -- no name too great for juxtsposition with honest (even if erring) censure. It is perhaps some evidence of our honesty that on these pages we continually record judgments against which our own critical convictions earnestly protest.

"Among the English (who have introduced fairles, witches, &c.] Shakespeare has incomparably excelled all others. That noble extravagance of fancy which he had in so great purfection thoroughly qualified him to touch this weak, superstitious part of his reader's imagination, and made him capable of succeeding where he had nothing to support him besides the strength of his own genius. There is something so wild, and yet so solemn, in the speeches of his ghosts, fairles, witches, and the like imaginary persons, that we cannot forbear thinking them natural, though we have no rule by which to judge of them, and must confess, if there are such beings in the world, it looks highly probable they should talk and act as he has represented them."—Addison: Spectotar, No. 419, July 1, 1712.

nust confess, if there are such beings in the world, it looks highly probable they should talk and act as he has represented them."—Addison: Sylvettor, No. 419, July 1, 1712.

"If Shakepeare be considered as a Man," remarks a famous historian, "born in a rude age and educated in the lowest manner, without any instruction, either from the world or from books, he may be regarded as a predigy: if represented as a Poet capable of furnishing a proper entertainment to a refined or intelligent audience, we must abate much of this culogy. In his compositions, we regret that many irregularities, and even absurdities, should so frequently disfigure the animated and passionate scenes intermixed with them; and at the same time we perhaps admire the more those beauties on account of their being surrounded with such deformities. Astriking peculiarity of sentiment, adapted to a single character, he frequently hits as it were by inspiration; but a reasonable propriety of thought he cannot for any thus uphold. Nervous and picturesque expressions as well as descriptions abound in hum; that it is in vain we look either for parity or simplicity of diction. His total ignorance of all theatrical art and conduct, however material a deget, yet, as it affects the spectator rather than the reader, we can more easily sexues than that want of taste which often prevails in his productions, and which gives way only by intervals to the tradistions of genius. A great and fertile genius he certainly possessed, and one enriched equally with a tragic and soule vein; but he quight to be cited as a proof how dangerous it is to rely on these advantages alone for attaining an excellence in the fluorest, if possible, the greateness of his genius, in the same manner as bodies often appear more gigantic on account of their being disproportioned and mashapen."—David Hunz: Hid. of May, Reighe stage might be considered equally without rule a suter critic, and one much more at home in this de-partment of letters, thinks very differently:

"The English stage might be considered equally without rule and without model when Shakapaers arose. The effect of the gashin of an individual upon the taste of a nation is mighty; but that genius, in its turn, is formed according to the nations (revalent at the period when it comes into existence. Such was the case with Shakspeare. Hed he received an education more extensive, and possessed a tasts redned by the classical models, it is probable that he also, in admiration of the ancient Brana, might have mistaken the form for the essence, and subscribed to those rules which had produced such master-pieres of art. Fortunately for the full exertion of a gentua as comprehensive and versatile as intense and powerful, Shakspeare had no access to any models of which the commanding merit might have controlled and limited his own exertions. He fullowed the nath which a nameloas great of obscurae writers merit might have controlled and limited his own exertions. He belowed the path which a nameless crowd of obscure writers had trudden before him; but he moved in it with the grace axis majestic step of a being of a superior order, and vindicated forever the British theatre from a pedantic restriction to classical rule. Nothing went before Shakspeare which in any respect was fit to fix and stamp the character of a national Drama; and was at the last of the control of th

"There are also many descriptions in the poets and orators which owe their sublimity to a richness and profusion of images, in which the mind is so dazzled as to make it impossible to attend to that exact coherence and agreement of the allusions which we should require on every other occasion. I do not remember a more striking example of this than the description which is given of the king's army in the play of Henry IV:

"It is absolutely necessary to recellect that the age in which Shakepeare lived was one of great abilities applied to individual and pudential purposes, and not an age of high moral feeling and loftly principle, which gives a man of genius the power of thinking of all things in reference to all. If, then, we should find that Shakepeare took these materials as they were presented to him, and yet to all effectual purposes produced the same grand result as others attempted to produce in an age so much more favourable, shall we not feel and acknowledge the purity and holiness of genius,—a light which, however it might shine on a dunghill, was as pure as the divine influence which created all the beauty of nature!"—Colernos.

"The value of any work of art is to be tested rather by its effect as a whole than by the effect of particular parts. And this especially applies to a work of dramatic art; for parts even fine in thomselves may, with reference to the entire effect of a drama, be bemishes instead of beauties. No writes that ever lived has approached Shakspere in the skill by which the whole is made to produce its entire and undisturbed effect. He is, thus, of all poets, the least to be appreciated from the study elone of 'specimens'. For although these may be sufficient to place him in the highest rank, in comparison with the 'specimens' of other writers, yet, separated from the parts by which they are naturally surrounded, they furnish no idea of the extraordinary harmony with which they are blended with all that follows them. Shakspere, beyond every other dramatic writer, possesses the power of enstaining a continuous idea, which imparts its own organization and vitality to the most diversified and seemingly soluted characters."—CRARLES KNIGHT: Schakspere, Pictorial ed., 2d ed., 1815, iv. 474.

De Quincey, who styles Shakspeare "the protagonist

De Quincey, who styles Shakspeare "the protagonist on the great arena of modern poetry, and the glory of the human intellect," has some lines of strength and beauty on his illustrious subject, for a few of which we must find room :

In the gravest sense it may be affirmed of Shukspeare, that "In the gravest sense it may be affirmed of Shakspeare, that he is among the molern luxuries of life; that his, in fact, is a new thing, and one more to be coveted, since Shakspeare has extended the domains of human concentences, and pushed its dark frontiers into regions not so much as dauly descried or even suspected before his time, far less illuminated (as now they are) by beauty and tronded luxuriance of life. For instance,—a single instance, indeed, one which in itself is a world of new a single instance, indeed, one which in itself is a world of new revelation.—the possible beauty of the female character had not been seen as in a dream before Shake-peare called Into perfect life the radiant shapes of bestemona, of Imogene, of Hermione, of Perdita, of Ophelia, of Mirabila, and many others. The Una of Spenser, earlier by ten or fitteen years than most of these, was an idealized portrait of female innocence and virgin purity, but too shadow; and unreal ter a drarintic reality. And as to the Oreclan classics, let not the reader imagine for an instant that any prototype in this field of Shaksperian power can be looked for there. . . In Shakspeare all is presented in the concrete; that is to say, not brought forward in rehef, or by some effort of an anatonical artist, but embedded, so to speak, as by the force of a creative nature, in the complex system of a human life; a life in which all the elements move and play simultaneously, and with something more than mere system of a human life; a life in which all the elements move and play simultaneously, and with something more than mero simultaneity or co-existence, acting and reacting each upon the other, may, even acting by each other and through each other. In Shakapare's characters is felt forcer a real organic life, where each is for the whole and in the whole, and where the whole is for each and in each. They only are real incarnations.

From his works alone might be gathered a golden head-roll of thoughts the deepet, subtilest most pathetic, and yet most catholic and universally intelligible; the most characteristic, also, and appropriate to the particular person, the situation, and the case, yet, at the same time, applicable to the circumstances of every human being, under all the accidents of life and all vicissitudes of fortune."—De Quincey's Life of Shokspeare, in Energe, Brit.; repub, in his Biog. Essays. See Lon. Quar. Rev., 1xx. 62. speure, in Encyc. Br Quar. Rev., lxx. 62.

Mr. De Quincey remarks (ubi supra) that it is "the prerogative of Shakspeare to have thought more finely and more extensively than all other posts combined;" again, (Literary Reminiscences: William Godwin.) that "few men would disagree in making Shakspeare the first of human intellects."

"few men would disagree in making Shakspeare the first of human intellects."

"O mighty post! Thy works are not, as those of other men, simply and merely great works of art, but are also like the phenomena of nature,—like the sun and the sea, the stars and the flowers, like first and snow, hall and dew, huit-storm and thender,—which are to be studied with entire submission of our own faculties, and in the perfect faith that in them there can be no too much or too little, nothing useless or inert; but that the further we preas in our discoveries the more we shall see proofs of design and self-supporting arrangement where the careless eye had seen nothing but accident."—Dz Quincz: The Knocking at the Gate in Macleth.

"The striking peculiarity of Shakspeare's mind was its generic quality, its power of communication with all other minds — to that it contained a universe of thought and feeling within itself, and had no one paculiar bias, or exclusive excellence, more than another. He was tait like any other man, but that he was like all other men. He was the least of an egotist that it was possible to be. He was nothing in himself; but he was all that others were or that they could become. He not only had in himself the germa of every faculty and feeling, but he could follow them by anticipation, intuitively, imp all their conceivable ramifications, through every change of fortune, or conflict of passion, or turn of thought. He had a mind reflecting ages past and present: all the people that ever lived are thore. There was no respect of persons with him. His genius shous equally on the avil and on the good, on the wise and the Rollsh, the monarch and the begger. All corners of the sarth, kings, queens, and states, maide, matrons, nay, the secrets of the grave' are hardly hid from his searching glance. He was like the genius of homanity, changing places with all of us at pleasare, and playing with our purposes as with his own. He turned the globe round for his amusement, and surveyed the generations of men, and the

give some extracts:

"In many points, however, he [Hazlitt] acquitted himself excellently; partly in the development of the principal characters with which Shakespeare has peopled the fancies of all English readers, but principally, we think, in the delicate sensibility with which he has traced and the natural eloquence with which he has pointed out that fond familiarity with boautiful forms and images—that elemant recurrence to what is sweet or indjectle in the simple aspects of nature—that indestructible love of flowers and clears, and early are and sounds, and bright skies, and woodland solitudes, and mornlight bowers, which are the Material elements of Poetry—and that fine sense of their undefined relation to mental ence moonlight bowers, which are the Material eloments of Poetrysand that fine sense of their undefined relation to mental emetion, which is its essence and vivifying Soul—and which, in the midst of Shakespeare's most busy and atrocious scenes, falls like gleams of annelines on rocks and runs—contrasting with all that is rugged and repulsive, and reminding us of the existence of purer and brighter elements, which ilk ALOVA has poured out from the richness of his own mind, without effort or restraint, and contrived to intermingle with the play of all the passions, and the vulgar course of this world's affairs, without deterting for an instant the proper business of the scene, or appearing to pause or degrees, from love of ornament or need of repose! Has ALOSE, who, when the object requires it, is always keen and worldly and practical—and who yet, without changing his hand or stopping his course, scatters around him, as he goes, all sounds and shapes of sweetness, and conjures up landscapes of immortal fragrance and freshness, and peoples them with spirits of glorious aspect and aftractive grace—and is a thousand times more full of fancy, and imagery, and splendor, than those who, in pursuit of such emberments, have should back from the delineation of character or passion, and declined the discussion of human duties and cares. More full of wisdom and ridicule and sagacty than all the moralists and satiriats that ever existed, he is more wild, siry, and inventive, and more pathets and that fine sense of their undefined relation to mental emoof human duties and cares. More full of wisdom and ridicule and sugacity than all the moralists and satiriats that ever existed, he is more wild, airy, and inventive, and more pathetic and fantastic, than all the poets of all regions and ages of the world; and has all those elements so happly mixed up in him, and bears his high faculties so temperately, that the most sewere reader cannot complaint of him for want of strength or of reason, nor the most sewerity, for defect of ornament or ingentity. Every thing in him is in unmeasured alundance and unequalited perfection, but every thing so balanced and kept in subordination as not to jostle or disturb or take the place of another. The most exquisite poetical conceptions, images, and descriptions, are given with such brevity, and introduced with such skill, as merely to adorn, without loading, the sense they accompany. Although his sails are purple and perfumed, and his prove of beaten gold, they waft him on his voyage not less, but more, rapidly and directly than if they had been composed of baser materials. All his excellences, like those of Nature hexelf, are thrown out togother; and, instead of interfering with, support and reconnend each other. His flowers are not tied up in garlands, nor his fruits crushed into baskets, but spring living from the soil, in all the dew and freshness of youth; while the graceful foliage in which they lurk, and the ample branches, the rough and vigorous stem, and the wide-spreading roots on which they depend, are present along with thom, and share, in their places, the equal care of their creator."

Something of his fordship's on the other side of the question will be found in the Edinburgh Review, Aug. 1811, 287. See, also, his remarks in the same periodical, xxxvi. 52, 415.

"Shakespeare is of no age. He speaks a language which thrills in our blood in spite of the separation of two hundred years. His thoughts, passions, feelings, strains of fancy, all are of this day, as they were of his own; and his genius may be contemporary with the mind of every generation for a thousand years to come. He, above all poets, looked upon men, and lived for mankind. His genius, universal in intellect and sympathy, could find in no more bounded circumference its proper sphere. It could not bear exclusion from any part of human existence. Whatever in nature and life was given to man, was given in contemplating and positry to him also, and over the undimned mirror of him vind passed all the shades of our mortal world. Look through as nis plays, and tell what form of existence, which quality of spirit, he is most skilful to delineate! Which of all the manifold soings he has drawn, lives before our thoughts, our eyes, in Luos unpictured reality? Is it Othello, Shylock, Falstaff, Lear, the Wife of Macbeth, Fraggen, Hamlet, Ariel? In none of the other great dramatists do we see any thing like a perfected art. In their works, every thing, it is true, exists, in some shape or other, which can be required in a drama taking for its interest the absolute interest of human life and nature; but, after all, may not the very best of their works be looked on as sublime masses of chaotic confusion, through which the elements of our noral being appear? It was Shakespeare, the most unlearned of all our writers, who first exhibited on the stage perfect models, perfect langes, of all human characters and of all human events. We cannot conceive any skill that could from his great characters remove any defect, or add to stage period: models, better magics, of att mann characters and of all human events. We cannot conceive my skill that could from his great characters remove any defect, or add to their perfect composition. Except in him, we look in vain for the entire falness, the self-consistency and self-completeness, of perfect art. All the rest of our drama may be regarded rather as a testimony of the state of genius—of the state of mind of the country, full of great practical disposition, and great tragic capacity and power—than as a collection of the works of an art. Of Shakespeare and Homer alone it may be averred that we miss in them nothing of the greatness of nature. In all other poets we do; we feel the measure of their power, and the restraint under which it is held; but in Shakespeare and in Homer all is free and unbounded as in nature, and as we travel along with them, in a car drawn by celestad steeds, our view seems ever interminable as before, and still equally far from of the glorious horizon."—Phor. "The name of Shakspeare is the greatest in our literature—it is the greatest in all literature. No man over came near to him in the creative powers of the mind; no man had ever such strength at once and such variety of magmatton. Coleradge has most felicitously applied to him a threek epithet, given before to I know not whom, octainly none so descring of it,—papsicovs, the thousand-souled Shakspeare. The number of characters in his plays is autonishingly great, without reckoming those whe, although transient, have often their individuality all distinct, all types of human life in well-defined difference. Yet he never takes an abstract quality to embody it, scarcely perhaps a definite condition of manners, as Jonson does; nor the he draw much, as I conceive, from living models: there is no manifest appearance of personal caricature in his comedies, though in some slight traits of character this may not improbably have been the case. Above all, neither he nor his contemporaries woots for the stage in the worst, though meet literal, and of late years the most usual, sense, making the servants and handmids of dramatic invention to lord over it, and limiting the expactice of the poof's mind to those of the performers. If this poverty of the representative department of the drama had hung like as incumbent flond on the creative power of Shakspeare, how would he have poured forth with such mexhaustible produgality the vast diversity of characters that we find in some of his plays? This is it in which he leaves far behind not the dramate character than surpassed them all. Others may have equalited him in grace and purity of language, and have shunned some of its faults; but the philosophy of Shakspeare, has intimate searching out of the human heart, whether in the gnomic form of sits faults; but the philosophy of

His lordship ascribes to Shakspeare "supreme and universal excellence;" pronounces him "the greatest of poets," (on Milford's Greece;) the Prince of Poets, (on Milford); "the greatest poet that ever lived," (on John Dryden;) declarest that he "has had neither equal nor second," (en Madame D'Arblay,) and considers Othello "perhaps the greatest work in the world," (on the Principal Hallian Writers.) See, also, his reviews of Moore's Life of Byron, and Croker's Boswell's Johnson.

It is the testimony of another eminent critic that "Shakespeare has transcendent excellence of every sort, and for every critic,—except those who are repelled by the faults which neutily attend sublime virtues,—character and manners, morality and prudence, as well as imagery and passion,"—Size James Mauxintosis: Edin. Rev., xxii. 34.

Again, in conversation with our late countryman, Alexander H. Everett, he remarked,

We may be charged with needlessly multiplying quotatious, (yet "what are these among so many?") but to prove by the testimony of those who have ranged over the literature of all languages that the English bard is not only a great poet, but the greatest of all poets, will not, we are persuaded, be a thankless office. And shall we not claim the second greatest bard also?

"A great poet," says La. dor, "represents a great portion of the human race. Nature delegated to Shakspeure the interests and direction of the whole; to Milton a smaller part, but with plenary power over it, and she bestowed on him such fervour and majesty of cloquence as on no other mortal in any age. . . . A rib of Shakspeare would have made a Milton; the same por-tion of Milton, all poets born ever since."

"SHAKESPEARE IN ITALY

"SHAKESPEARE IN ITALY.

Beyond our shores, beyond the Apennines, Shakespeare, from heaven came thy creative breath! Mid citron grove and overarching vines. Thy genius wept at Desdemona's death:
In the prond sire thou badeat anger cease,
And Juliet by her Romeo sleeps in peace.
Then rose thy voice shove the stormy sea,
And Ariel flew from Prospero to thee."—W. S. Landon, July 1, 1869: Atlantic Monthly, May, 1866, 549: Laat Days of Walter Savage Landor, (by Muss Kate Field). Continued in No. for June, 1866, where (p. 701) Landor is cited as calling "Shakespeare the wisest of men, as the greatest of poets."
"I have read and studied our great dramatist for nearly haif a century; and if I could read and study him for half a century more, I should yet be far from arriving at an accurate knowledge of his works, or an adequate appreciation of his worth. He is an author whom no man can read enough, nor study enough."

J. PATNE COLLIER: Notes and Emendations to the Text of Shakespeare's Plays, de., 1883, Introduction.

"Make," says Bishop Watson, "Bacon, then, and Locke—and why should I not add that sweet child of nature, Shakepeare?—your chief companions through life; let them be ever upon your table, and, when you have an hour to spare, spend it upon them; and I will answer for their giving you entertainment and in struction as long as you live."

We like these clerical testimonies to the value of the poetry, philosophy, and wisdom of the greatest of all poets, philosophers, and sages: let us adduce one or two more of such from the many on record. A profound teacher of one of the "straitest of all the sects" into which a large portion of the modern religious world is divided, thus counsels "the man who would preach theology successfully :"

logy successfully:"

"Let him not deem it a profanation of his sacred voration to be familiar with the Bard of Avon, that man who seemed to look into the very soul itself, and see how it would act and speak in any situation of life; who drew his characters not from his knowledge of what had been, but from his intuitive perception of what would be if human beings should be placed in certain circumstances; that man who, with no systematic knowledge of scholastic study, comprehended all the powers and uses of the Ruglish language so as to speak as no uninepingl span ever spoke; who understood all the springs of human motives, and, entered into every human character, male and female, English.

Archbishop Sharp advised all young divines to unite the reading of Shakspeare to the study of the Bible, and declared that these two books had made him Archbishop of York; and Mr. Speaker Onslow, who tells us this anecdote, adds, noblemes of his sentiments, and the amazing force and brightness of his expression, do indeed make Shakacapaar to be a groat pattent for the gravet and most solemn compositions,"—Burnets Own Times, 21 ed., 18 Cl. in, 107.

"His wonderful knowledge of human nature, the dignity and nobleness of his sentiments, and the amazing force and brightness of his expression, do indeed make Shakaepaar to be a great pattern for the gravest and most sofemn compositions,"—Burnets Oven Tones, 21 ed., 1833, in, 107.

"I doubt whether Shakapare ever had any thought at all of making his personages speak characteristically. In most instances, I conceive,—probably in all,—the drew characters correctly because he readth not aread it; and would never have stanced, in that department, such excellence as he has, it he had made any studied offerts for it. And the same, probably may be said of Homer, and of those other writes who have excelled the most in deline ting characters. Shakapare's pecular genus consisted chi fly, I conceive, in his forming the same distinct and consistent idea of an imaginary person that an ordinary man forms of a real and well known individual, We usually conjecture pretty accurately, concerning a very intimate acquaintance, how he would speak or nat on any supersod occasion; if any one should report to be low having doscribed with the inconsistency; and we often represent to ourselves, and describe to others, without any conscious flort, not only the substance of what he would have been likely to say, but even his characteristic phrases and looks. Shak-peare could no more have endured an expression from the laps of Macbeth in consistent with the character originally conceived, than an ordinary man could attribute to his most respectable acqui unitance the behavloor of a rufflan, or to a human being the vote of a brief, or to a European the features and his of a negro. Merely from the visidness of the original conception, characteristic conduct and languages spontaneously suggested them-elves to the great dramatist's pen. He original conception, characteristic conduct and languages spontaneously suggested them elves to he great dramatist's pen. "We discoursed upon English literature, on the greatness of Shakspeare, and on the unavourable position held by all English dramatic authors who have appeared after that position, and discounted domastic action of many importance, and total many discounted the whole of haman and the standard of the standard of the whole of haman and the standard of the standard of the whole of haman and the standard of the standard of the whole of haman nature in all its tendencies, in all its heights and depths, and that, in fact, there remains for him, the after-comer, nothing more to do. And how could one get comage to put pen to paper, if one were conscious, in an earnest appreciating spirit, that such unfathomable and mattanable excellences were already in existence? for his exhibition of passion, taking this word in its widest signification, as including every manual condition, every tone, from indifference or inmiliar mirch to the wildest rage and despair. He gives us the history of minds; he lays open to us, in a single word, a whole series of their anterior states. His passions do not stand at the same height from first to last, as is the case with so many tragic peots, who, in the language of Lessing, are thorough masters of the legal style of lows. He paints, with himitable veracity, the gradual advance from the first origin; 'the gives,' as Lessing says, 'a living picture of all the slight and secret artifices by which a feeling steals into our souls, of all the imperceptible advantages which it there gams, of all the imperceptible advantages which it there gams, of all the imperceptible advantages which it there gams, of all the imperceptible according to the property of the elone has portrayed the mental diseases, melancholy, delirium, lunacy, with such inexpressible and, in every respect, definite truth, that the physician may enrich his observations from them in the same manner as from real cases. . . . And this tragical Titan, who storms the heavens and threatens to tear the world from off its hinges; who, more terrible than Æschylus, makes our half to stand on end, and congents our blood with horror, possessed at the same time the misinasting loveliness of the sweetest poetry; he toys with love like a child, and his song die away on the ear like melting sighs. He unites in his soul the utmost elevation and the utmost depth; and the most opposite and even apparently irreconcilable properties suisast in him peacefully logethor. The world of spirits and nature have laid all their treasures at his feet; in attempts a demi-god, in profundity of view a prophet, in all-seeing wisdom a guardian spirit of a higher order, he lower himself to mattals, as if unconscious of his superiority, and is as open and unassuming as a child. . . Shak-peare's coulc stalent is equally the means of execution, deserves the name of correctness, (and this, execpling in malters of grammar, is the only proper sense of the term;) we shall then, after allowing to Shakspeare all the higher qualities which demand our admiration, he also compelled, in most cases, to concede to him the title of a correct post. —A CRUST WILLELM VON SCHLEREL: Lects, on Dramat. "Ever since I have been able to think and feel, I have recognized Shakspere as the first among all poets; the richest and deepest, the most instructive and delightful, the most mysterious and the clearest, and to whom I devoted myself with ever new reverence and love. ... In Shakspere, poetry, virtue, truth, life, and history is altogether one; he is therefore not only a great poet in the usual souse of the word, but also for every thinking being an instructive author; the best exponder of the scriptural text, the earth is everywhere the Lord's."—Franz Horn: Skaksperer's Skausspiet Erkliutert, 1822, Profuces, vii.—x. "In one word, this unparalleled gigantic spirit, like the Indian Brahma, readily takes on him divers incarnations, of which none perhaps may succeed in imbiling and reflecting all his fulness and splendour. . . The incomparable Briton is not generally to be read as we read Kotzebue or Clausen; whoever approaches him feels himself moved by something elevated—a reverence-commanding spirit stands before $\frac{1}{2}$ in who requires attentive consideration, and even a self-collectedness."—JULICS KORENER, of Schneeberg: Translation of Skakspere into German.

"In estimating the value of Shakespearian citiciam, the distinction between its relative and comparative importance is too often lost sight of. Relatively to the text, it is the most important attidy in English literature; viewed comparatively with that text, it sinks into insignificance. I would not surrender the little induction to the Taming of the Shrew in exchange for all the results, present and future, of all Shakespearian criticism. On the other hand, the true restoration of a single line in Shakespeare is well worth the best volume of any other English writer.

"The true secret of the dislike in some quarters to Shakespeare Commentary is, I believe, to be found in the baseless fancy that the critica seek an alliance in the matter of fame with his imperishable glory. As well might one accuse the communicators on the Bible of a wish to be thought inspired. Shakespeare, the most difficult in another. A little patient study of the subject will convince any one that the works of Shakespeare require and deserve, for their complete interpretation, a larger amount of commentary than du those of any other English writer."—J. "The extant and accuracy of the medical, physiological, and psychological knowledge displayed in the distance of all inatters upon which the rays of his mighty genius fell, have excited the wonder and astonishment of all men who, since his time, have brought their minds to the investigation of those subjects upon which so much light has been thrown by the researches of modern science. Shakspeare's knowledge extended far beyond the range of ordinary observation, and comprehended subjects such as in our day, and we may suppose in his, were regarded as strictly professional and special. ... In fact, we believe a very complete physiological and special. ... In fact, we believe a very complete physiological and special in his, were regarded as excerdance, in almost every search all particular, with that which we now possess as the result of the scientific research and experience of the last two centuries. "It is remarkable that two of the most perfect pictures of Insanity presented to us in the plays of Shakspeare are instances of feigned madness,—n unely, the madness of Hamlet, assumed, to escape the machinations of his micle, and that of Bilgar, in Lear, assumed to escape the persecutions of his brother. These inimitable representations of the phenomena of insanity are so perfect that in their perusal we are insensibly led to forget that they are feigned. In both instances, however, the deception was practised by educated gentlemen; and on the authority of the great dramatic psychologist it may, perhaps, be accepted that the phenomena of insanity may be feigned by a skiful actor like Hamlet so perfectly that no flaw can be detected in the representation."—Dr. J. "These quotations sufficiently show that the presiding genius "These quotations sufficiently show that the presiding genius of the Avon is Shakepere. But, even without this parament consideration, the river, although little visited, abounds with picturesque scenery and interesting objects. A big dull book has been written upon it, by one who could neither put down with exactness what he saw, nor impart any life to his meagre descriptions. From the first section of his book... to the last... the Picturesque Views of Mr. Samnel Ireland appear to us the production of the most spiritless of delineators. We would not recommend the tourist to encumber himself with this heavy book."—Charles Knidur: Pictorial Shoksp., 2d ed., 1867, viil. 255, (William Shakspere; a Biography.)

The North American Review, April, 1854, 390-423, Francis Bowen,) and The London Athensoum, (ride 1863 et seq., Indexes.) were among the chief champions of the Corrector and Amender of the mysterious Perkins Folio. The former expressed the belief that "the sura instinct of public taste" would "finally incorporate into the received text far the larger portion of the encudations made by a poor player in the first half of the seventeenth century, ' (p. 423:) and the latter, whilet admitting that the Folio Corrector was "occasionally puerile, often mistaken," had "no hesitation, after some years' study," in pronouncing him "the most precious acquisition ever in pronouncing nim—the most precious acquisition ever made to our means of receiving a genuine Shakspeare text," (1858, i. 559.) On the other hand, Halliwell, Singer, Dyco, Knight, R. G. White, Brae, Hamilton, Hardy, Sir F. Madden, and Ingleby are more or less skeptical both as regards the antiquity and the value of skepitch both as regards ine antiquity and the value of the annotations. Mr. White, whose edition of the poet the Atheneum, 1858, ii. 612, considers to have been benefited by the annotations of The Corrector, remarks, (Athen, 1869, i. 855.) "It seems to me more than probable that most of the many marginal readings in this folio, not peculiar to it, are as spurious in their form as most of the few peculiar to it are, in my judgment, worth-less in their essence." Much industry, some logic, and, we regret to add, a vast deal of all temper, were expended on this discussion. The fruits of the first and peruval of the second were not without advantage to printers and readers; the third profited nobody, and was altogether out of place, for (we again quote Mr. White, ubi supra) "why men should lose their tempers about such purely impersonal questions as whether a certain line should read thus or so, or certain pen and pencil marks were made in the ninetcenth century or the seventeenth. I cannot understand."

Henceforth there will be a proper depository for SHAK-SPEARIANA. On the 23d of April, 1868, "The SHAK-SPEARE Library," founded at Birmingham, in 1864, as a tercentenary memorial, was formally opened for public use. A library devoted to the works produced and elicited by one man,-this is a monument indeed! But there has been but one such man! Let it be accepted as a truth past been but one suon man; Let it be accepted as a truth past all debate, that among the great ones of the earth Shak-spears stands alone,—in unapproachable majesty. What was the secret of his power; from whence derived this marvellous insight into human nature under all circumstances, ages, and climes, this accurate knowledge of sciences, arts, governments, morals, manners, philoso-phies, and codes, this exquisite command of language,— never wielded with such skill before or since,—by which each character, event, or thought is drawn in lives of living light;—this, the greatest of all human mysteries, which we have received from our fathers, we must transmit, despend and heightened rather than lessened by our labours, to our children.

Our "Shaksprariama" alone numbers about one thousand and forty printed volumes and tracts: how many editions of "Shaksprare's Works," separate and collective, in various languages, we have recorded, we have not taken the trouble to compute. In typographical bulk this article on the great poet, philosopher, and sage would make a duodecime volume of about 238 pages, type the same size as that in the narrative portion of the New York edition of The Life and Letters of Washington Irving, or the London edition of the Memoirs, &c. of Thomas Moore. The alphabotical INDEX exhibits a brilliant succession of great names,—the names of men who have distinguished themselves in almost every department of knowledge, and who, however diverse their pursuits and tastes, unite in paying willing tribute to the illustrious intellect which has transcended them all.

Sharp, Granville, 1734-1813, the grandson of an Archbishop of York, the son of an Archbishop of North-umberland, the father of a Prebendary of Durham, a native of Durham, was bound apprentice to a London linen-draper in 1750, but soon after commenced the study of law, which he did not practise. He obtained a place in the Ordnance Office, which, after several years' occupancy, he resigned in April, 1777, rather than assist in the prosecution of the war against the American colonies. The rest of his life was chiefly devoted to his books, and those philanthropic exertions on behalf of the oppressed, (e.g. the slaves Strong and Somerset,) and the rights of the subject, (the case of the impressment of Miliachip, &c.,) which cast such enduring honour on his name. Of his sixty-one publications, principally pamphlets upon theological and political subjects and the evils of slavery, the following are among the most important: 1. Remarks on a Printed Paper entitled A Catalogue of the Sacred Vessels restored by Cyrus, and of the Chief Jews, Ac., Lon., 1765, 75, 8vo. Anon.
"Exposes some mistakes of Dr. Kennicott,"—Orme's Bibl. Bib.,

2. Remarks on several very Important Prophecies, in 5 Parts, 1768, 75, 8vo.

"Contain some valuable observations on Isalah vii. 13, 16, and some other passages."—Orme's Bibl. Bib., 390.

3. Short Treatise on the English Tongue, Eng. and French, 1767, 8vo. 4. Slavery in England, 1789, 8vo; with Appendix, 1772, 8vo. 5. Tract on Duelling, 1773, '90, 8vo. 6. Declaration of the People's Natural Rights to a Share in the Legislature, 1774, 8vo; 1775, 8vo.
"This soler, rational, and dispassionate performance."-

Month. Rev. 7. The Just Limitation of Slavery in the Laws of God, 1776, 8vo. 8. The Law of Liberty, 1776, 8vo. 9. The Law of Nature, &c., 1777, 1809, 8vo. 10. Andient Divisions of the English Nation into Hundreds and Tithings, 1784, 8vo. 11. Congregational Courts, more particularly of Frankpledge, 1786, 8vo; new ed., with two Tracts on Coloniaction, with a Short Memoir of the Author by J. I. Burn, 1841, 12mo. 12. Remarks on the Uses of the Definitive Article in the Greek Text of the New Texts. ment Durham, 1798, 8vo 2d el, with Appendix on Christ's Divinity, 1902 12mo, 31 ed 1803, 12mo Appendix only Dissertation, &c., 1906 12m Shebbeare, John, M D., 1709. 788, a native of Shebbeare, John, M.D., 1709. '88, a native of Bideford, Devonshire, lived for many years in London as a political Tory writer, and pub. thirty-four books and pamphlets, of which at least thirty are now forgotten. We notice: 1. New Analysis of the Bristol Waters, Lon., 1740, 4to. 2. The Marriage Act; a Political Novel, 1754. The strictures on Parliament in this book caused him to be involved. him to be imprisoned. 3. Letters on the English Nation, by Battista Angeloni, a Jesuit, who resided many Years in London; trans. from the Original Italian by the Au-thor of The Marriage Act, 1755, 2 vols. 8vo; 1756, 2 vols. 8vo. The only "Jesuit" in the case was Shebbcare bimself.

"Ho deserves to be remembered as a respectable name in literature, were it only for his admirable "Letters on the English Nation," under the name of Battista Angeloni, a Jesuit."—Boswell.: Life of Johnson, year 1781.

New 17, 1576, 27. of England, Nos. 1-7, 1756-57, 8vo. Some copies of the 7th Letter were seized; and for the attacks on Government in the preceding Letters, Shebbeare was fined, pilleried, and imprisoned. The pillery is thus cruelly alluded to:

"Witness, ye Hills, ye Johnsons, Scots, Shebbeares, Hark to my call, for some of you have ears." Heroic Epistle: see Croker's Boswell, Index.

But his cars were uninjured: indeed, Beardmore, the under heriff. Shebbeare's old coadjutor in the Mouitor, was fined and imprisoned for his lenity to the doctor. Boswell (if his allusion was to Shebbeare) thought he "was not dishonoured by it."

"Johnson.—'Ay, but he was, sir. He could not mouth and strut about as he used to do, after having been there. People are not willing to ask a man to their tables who has stood in the pillory.'"—Bosee Il's Johnson, year 1778.

This error of judgment was more easily pardoned by the wits of that day, as it combled them to complain that "the King had pensioned a Sa-bear and a He-bear."

Smollett introduced him under the name of Ferret in the novel of Sir Launcelot Greaves; Hogarth made him one of the group in his third Election print: and the periadical foundation. Donaldam, Lap., 2 vol., and 2 vol of the group in his third Election print: and the periodicals found him profitable as a stock subject of ridicule and represent. But "none of these things moved him," so long as he could find reviews to write at six guineas per sheet (Boswell's Johnson, year 1783) and enemies to abuse at three shillings per pamphlet. A biographical notice of him appeared in the European Magazine for 1788, which was republished separately, and partially transferred to Chalmers's Biog. Diet., xxvii. 430-431. Sec, also, Encyc. Shee, Sir George. On the Construction of Ships;

Trans. Irish Acad., 1794, vol. vi.

Shee, Sir Martin Archer, Knt., D.C.L., a dd. seendant of the Princes O'Shee of Korry and Tipperary, was b. at Dublin, Dec. 23, 1770, emigrated to London, swar there introduced by Edward Beste to Revendes. was there introduced by Edmund Burke to Reynolds and became a contributor to the Exhibition in 1789; elected an Associate to the Royal Academy, 1798, an Academiciau, 1800, and President and knighted, 1830; Academician, 1800, and President and knighted, 1830; d. at Brighton, August 19, 1859. As a portrait-painter he cannot be called more than second-rate; as a poet—Lord Byron to the contrary notwithstanding—he will hardly rank so high. I. Rhymes on Art: or, The Remonstrance of a Painter, in Two Parts; with Notes and a Preface; including Strictures, &c., Lon., 1805, 8vc; 2d ed., 1805: 3d ed., 1806. 12mo.

In the Preface he attacks Colman, who refused to license the play for the stage, on account of some lines calculated, as C. thought, to encourage sedition. Thereupon Shee published it,-to his no small profit:

"Shee told us he had get five hundred guineas for the copyright of his rejected play. Ablot, in coming away with me in a hackney-coach, remarked how lucky Shee was."—Memoirs, do. of T. Moors, iv. 1838, 161.

1. An Essay upon Poetry, Lon., 1682, 4to. In English and Latin, by John Norris, 1691. In French, by M. Trocheran, Paris, 1749, 12uno.

"His Essay on Poetry is the great work for which he was praived by Roscommon, Dryden, and Pope, and doubtless by meny mere whose culogies have perished. . . . The precepts are judicious, sometimes new, and often happily expressed; but there are, after all the emendations, many weak lines, and some strange appearances of negligence. . . . His verses are often insipid; but his memoirs are lively and agreeable: he had the perspecify and elegance of an historian, but not the firs and lancy of a poet."—Dr. Jonsson: Lices of the Poets, Cunninghant's ed., 1851, il. 197, 198, (q. v.)

The highest compliment paid to his Essay on Satire was the beating procured by Rochester for Dryden on suspicion of his being the author of it; and a portion of it has been confidently ascribed to him; but this pre-sumption some eminent modern critics will by no means

"I cannot think that any part of the 'Essay on Satire' received additions from Dryden's pen. Probably he might contribute a lew hunts for revision; but the author of 'Absalom and Achitophel' could never completely diagnise the powers which were shortly to produce that brilliant satire. Dryden's verses must have shone among Mulgrave's as gold beside copper. The whole Essay is a mere stagnant level, no one part of it so far rising above the rest as to bespeek the work of a superior hand. The thoughts, even when conceived with some spirit, are clumsily and unhappily brought out,—a fault never to be traced in the beautiful language of Dryden, whose powers of expression were at least equal to his force of conception."—Siz Walter Score: Life of Dryden: Miscell. Sheil, Rt. Hon. Richard Lalor, M.P., b. in Dublin, 1793; was educated at the Jesuit College of Stonyhurst, Lancashire, and at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated with distinction: called to the Irish Bar, 1814; became an active member of the Catholic Association, 1822; returned to Parliament for Anglesey's borough of Milborne Port, 1829, and again in 1830, for Louth in 1832, and for Tipperary in 1832, 1835, and 1837-41; a Commissioner of Greenwich Hospital, 1838; Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and a Privy Councillor, 1839; Judge-Advocate General, June-Sept. 1841; M.P. for Dungaryan, 1811-50; Master of the Mint, 1816 to November, 1850; and from that time until his death, at Florence, May 23, 1851, British Minister at the Court of Tuscany. In early life Mr. Sheil acquired considerable reputation as the author of the tragedies Adelaide, The Apostate, Bellamira, Evadne, and The Hugnenot. Of Adelaide (Dubl., 1814, Svo; 2d ed., Lon., 1816) a review will be found in Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxiv. 236; of The Apostate (1817, 8vo) notices occur in Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxiv. 239, and Lon. Quar. Rev., xvii. 248. Evudne, the most successful, (largely indebted to Shirley's Traitor.) appeared in 1820. Neither of the critiques just referred to is complimentary. That the acting of Miss O'Neil, with an eye to which Shell especially exerted his genius, contributed greatly to the fame of the dramatist, is not to be questioned.

Gramatist, is not to be questioned.

"There is much vigour of language, force of character, and originality of incident about his dramas; he is carnest, forcent, and impassioned; he is also unequal, and sometimes improbable. All the grand elements of the drama scent in him; he has made a poor exchange so far as fame is concerned, in preferring, like Sharidan, to move the House of Commons rather than ngitate the audience in Old Drary,"—ALLY CUNNINGEAN: Biog. and Crit. Hist., &c., 1833.

As an orator, Sheil's reputation has certainly not as an ormor, onen's reputation has certainty hot gained; and it is the judgment of one of the most intelligent of modern critics (see Dr. R. S. Mackenzie's edition of Noctes Ambrosianse, iii. 208, n.) that he was never equal to O'Connell. His Speeches, with a Memoir by equat to O'Connell. His specules, with a station of T. MacNovin, were pub., Lon., 1845, 8vo; again, 1846, '47, '54, '56, and '60. Since his death have appeared: 2. Sheil's Sketches of the Irish Bar. Shelley, Percy Bysshe, b. at Field Place, near Horsham, Sussex, August 4, 1792, drowned by the capsizing of his boat in the Mediterranean, between Leghorn and the Bay of Spezia, July, 1822, was the eldest son of Sir Timothy Shelley, and a descendant of one of the followers of William of Normandy whose name is recorded on the roll of Battle Abbey. The head of this ancient family is Sir John Villiers Shelley, born in 1808, The head of this now (1869) in his flat or 62d year. The head of the branch to which our author belonged is Sir Percy Florence Shelley, Baronet, son of the poet and his second wife, (supra,) who was born at Florence in 1819, and successful his grandfather in the title and estates in 1844. The poet's paternal great-grandfather, Timothy, emigrated to Newark, New Jersey, where he married an American wife, and where Shelley's grandfather, Bysshe, was horn. After preparatory tuition at Sion House, near Brantford, the subject of our notice in 1805 removed to Eton, there dreamed and studied for three years, and in 1810 was entered at University College, Oxford. But he had now been for some years an author: whilst at home in 1808 he completed two romances commenced at Eton, - Zastrozzi, and St. Irvyne, or The Rosicrusian. They were published anonymously, and condemned. About this time, also, he assisted Captain Medwin in the composition of a poem which was condemned without being published,—Ahasuerus, or The Wandering Jew;—depublished,—Ahasuerus, or The Wandering Jew;—de-clined by Campbell (New Monthly Magazine) on the ground that it had only two good lines in it. Four cantos, however, many years later gained admittance into Fraser's Magazine, (vol. iii. 529, 666, 1831:) see, also, Medwiy, Thoyas, R.A., No. 3.

He had not been long at Oxford before he published an anonymous volume of poems, entitled Posthumous Poems of my Aunt Margaret Nicholson. This, like the preceding publications, was soon forgotten, (indeed, they can hardly be said to have been ever known;) but about a year later he unfortunately printed at London a pamphlet destined to an unhappy prominence and a baleful influence on his future life.—A Defonce of Atheism. This, it is alleged, was simply intended as a challenge to debate, and copies were forwarded to the heads of the colleges with a view to their preparation for dialectical exercise. The invitation, however, was declined; and the youthful polemic, neither denying nor admitting the authorship of the obnoxious thesis, was in March, 1811, expelled from the University. Instead of profiting by this admonition, he employed his leisure hours in London-for his father would not at first permit him to return home-in completing what he should nover have begun,-the impious rhapsody of Queen Mab. In August, 1811, he was received into the paternal mansion; and, though certainly possessing little in common with his father in the way of tastes and cultivation, here he might have resided at his case, absorbed in his books, the contemplation of nature, and the exercise of his rare powers of imagination and expression; but the same month which witnessed his return saw him, after less than half a dozen interviews, the husband, through the rites of Gretna Green, of Miss Harriet Westbrooks, the daughter of a refired botol-keeper. Such matches are not always unhappy,—paternal tradition to the contrary notwith standing: this was very unhappy; and in June, 1814, the bride, who had about three months before been ferther than the standing to the bride with the standing to the sta the order, who had about three months before been formally remarried, in England, to Shelley, returned to her father. The same year Shelley started for the Continent in company with Mary Wollstonecraft, the daughter of William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft, to whom he was subsequently married. (See Shelley's father, in vietna of a business arrangement. of a business arrangement, agreed to allow his son $5000 per annum,—a sum much more than sufficient for his away wants; but the poet was one of the most generals of mortals, and a man of his character seldom lacks op-portunities for beneficence. It was in this year that he wrote his beautiful poem of Alastor; or, The Spirit of Stiltude. In November, 1816, Mrs. Shelley committed minida by drawning leaving two shill-hand a daughter. Siliude: In November, 1316, Mrs. Shelley committed suicide by drowning, leaving two children (a daughter, b. 1813, and a son, b. 1811 or 1815, d. 1826) by the poet; and these Mr. Westbrooke, the grandfather, refused to part with, upon the ground that the father was not a person likely either by procept or example to instil virtuous principles into youthful minds. The case was brought into Chancery, and in March, 1817, Lord-Chancellor Eldon decided that the grandfather should retain the abildren. Instead of opening any argument, in this the children. Instead of opening any argument, in this place, on the justice or injustice of this decision, we think it sufficient, and much fairer, to refer the reader to Lord Eldon's Decision as recorded in Jacob's Reports. 267, Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxix. 193, 200, 210, and the biographical accounts of Shelley to be cited herenfter. Our author now left for the Continent, and in Switzerland formed that intimacy with Lord Byron to which we have alluded in our notice of his lordship in this Dictionary,

In 1817 Shelley returned to England, and for nearly a year resided at Marlow, Buckinghamshire, where, at the sacrifico of time, money, domestic comfort, literary case, and suffering under an attack of ophthalmia, he acted the part of a good Samaritan among the poor people of his neighbourhood. His leisure hours were devoted to the composition of The Revolt of Islam, and a part of Rosamarch, 1818, that he gazed for the hast time upon the shores of his native land. Three acts of Prometheus Unbound were composed whilst wandering in Italy, ("upon the mountainous ruins of the Baths of Carasalla," &c.;) the fourth act was added at Florence in the latter part of 1819; and it was whilst at Rome, a few months earlier, that he made his translation of Plato's Symposium. In the same year he wrote The Cenci, The Masque of Anarchy, and The Witch of Atlas; in 1820, The Sensitive Plant, Julian and Maddolo, (Shelley and Byron.) and some smaller pieces; in 1821, Epipsychidion Adonais, (cide Kears, John, p. 1810, supra.) and Hellas, a contribution to the cause of Grecian independence.

The last eighteen months of his life were passed in daily intercourse with Lord Byron; and his lordship's poetry seems to have profited by this companiouship. In June, 1822, he was residing at Lerici, a town on the coast of the Bay of Spezia. On the 30th of that month, in company with his friend Captain Williams and one eaman, he set sail, in an open boat, to welcome Leigh Hunt, who had arrived at Leghorn.

Hunt, who had arrived at Leghorn.

"On Monday, the 8th of July," writes Mr. Trelawny, "they got under way to return home, having on board a quantity of abusehold articles, four hundred dollars, a small cance, and some books and manuscripts. At half-past twelve they made all sail out of the harbour, with a light and favourable breeze, steering direct for Spezia. I had likewise weighed anchor to accompany them a few miles out in Lord Byron's schooner, the Bollvar; but there was some denur about papers from the guard-boat, and they, fearful of looing the breeze, sailed without me. I re-anchored, and watched my friends till their host became a speck on the horizon, which was growing thick and dark with heavy clouds moving rapidly and gathering in the southwest quarter. I then retured to the cabin, where I had not been half an hour before a man on deck told me a heavy squall had come on. . Becoming greatly slarmed for the safety of the voyagers, a note was despatched to Mr. Shelley's house at Lerici, the reply to which stated that nothing had been heard of him and his friend; which augmented our fears to such a degree that couriors were despatched on the whole line of coast from Leghorn to Nice, to ascertain if they had put in anywhere, or if there had been any wreck, or indications of to such a degree that courters were despatched on the whole line of coast from Leghorn to Nice, to ascertain if they had put in anywhere, or if there had been any wreck, or indications of Iosses by sea. I immediately started for Via Reggio, having loss sight of the best in that direction. My worst fears were almost confirmed, on my arrival there, by news that a small cannot, two empty water-barrels, and a bottle had been found on the shore, which things I recognized as belonging to the beat. I had still, however, warm hopes that these articles had been thrown overboard to clear them from useless lumbes in the storm; and it seemed a general opinion that they had missed Leghorn and put into Elis or Corsica, as nothing more was seard for eight days. This state of surpense becoming inclerable, I returned from Spezia to Via Reggio, where my worst fears were confirmed by the information that two bodies had been washed on shore, one on that night very near the town, which, by the dress and stature, I knew to be Mr. Shelloy's. Mr. Keatz's last writum of 'Lamia,' 'itsbella,' &c. being open in the factor-pocket confirmed it beyond a doubt. The hody of Millsma was subsequently found noar a tower on the Tustics work, about four miles from his companion. Both the badies were greatly decomposed by the eea, but identified begond a death. The seamen, Charles Vivian, was not found for pastly three weeks afterwards. His body was interred on the east on which a wave had washed it, in the vicinity of Massa."

The hodies of Williams and Shelley (save Shelley's heart, which remained unconsumed by the fire) were burnt, according to the requisitions of the Quarantine haws of Tuscany: the ashes of Williams were sent to England; those of the post were deposited in the Protestant burial-ground at Rome, so beautifully described in Admais as the last restingulates of the management. in Adunais as the last resting place of the mourner's friend, Keats. Lord Byron superintended the sad seremony, and a few months later (in April, 1823) he thus referred to Shelley and his death:

referred to Shelley and his death:

"You should have known Shelley," said Byron, 'to feel how much I must regret him. He was the most gentle, most analable, and least worldly-minded person I ever mot; full of deliancy, disinterested beyond all other men, and possessing a degree of genius, joined to a sumplicity as arons it is admirable. He had formed to humself a hear-didet of all that is fine, high-minded, and noble, and he acted up to this ideal even to the very letter. Its had a most brilliant imagination, but a total want of warldry wisdom. I have seen nothing like him, and nover shall again, I am certain. I never can forget the might that his poor wife rushed into my room at Pisa, with a face as pale as marble, and terror impressed on her brow, demanding, with all the trugle impetuo-ity of grief and alarm, where was her hudland? Vain were all our efforts to caim her; a desperate sort of courage seemed for give her energy to confront the horrible fate that awaited her; it was the courage of despair. I have seen nothing in trag-dy or on the stage so powerful, or so affecting, as her appearance; and it often presents fixelf to my memory. I knew nothing then of the catagratophe, but the vividence of her terror communicated itself to me, and I feared the worst,—which fears were, minal too koon fearfully realized,"—Chanless of Blessing-ton's Omerce, with Lord Byron.

According to Mr. Trelawny's Recollections, his ford-ship was no loser by Shelloy's "simplicity" and "total want of worldly wisdom." Let us now consider his prowant of worldly wisdom." ductions:

1. Queen Mab, 1813, 8vo: privately printed without a title-page, 1821, 8vo: surreptitionsly published, and the issue disavowed by the author in a letter to the Examiner, (q. r.,) with Notes, Lou., 1821, 8vo : 1829, 8vo. Notices of this incongruous mixture of poetry, profanity, and nonsense will be found in Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1821, 305; Lon. Athen., 1832, 473, n.; Lon. Quar. Rev., xxix. 193, 210, lxv. 516. See, also, Reply to the Anti-Matrimonial Hypothesis and supposed Atheism of Percy Bysshe Shelley, as laid down in Queen Mab, 1821, 8vo, pp. iv., 76. It is sufficient to say of Queen Mab that it is an effusion which no man should have written, no publisher should circulate, and no family library should contain. The legal proceedings connected with its late republication, and proceedings connected with its into republication, Sir T. N. Talfourd's speech on this subject, are familiar to many of our readers.

Reviewed with great severity in Lon. Quar. Rev., xxi. 489. The reviewer (erroneously supposed by Shelley to be Robert Southey; see Southey's Life and Corresp., chap. xxv., and Shelley Memorials, 1859) was attacked by Blackw. Mag., vi. 153, and in that periodical, vol. iv. 475, will be found an elaborate critique on the poem: "Its praise," remarks his reviewer, "is, in our judgment, that of having poured over his narrative a very rare strength and abundance of puetic imagery and feeling,—of having steeped every word in the essence of his inspiration."

1820, (some 1821.) Seo. We have already expressed our disapproval of the revival of this shameful story, (see Monvi, Luigi, No. 3.) The great power with which it is dramatized by Shelley is therefore deeply to be regretted. In the name of decency, morality, and religion, is there not enough that is "pare, lovely, and of good report," wherewith to entertain our leisure hours, without exhuming these shominations of the past? See Blackw. Mag., lxx. 505.

Sir John Simeon has recently (1860) privately printed for antiquaries (not splendidly published for family libraries, as is Shelley's poetloal version) a contemporary account, in Italian, of the murder of Cenci and the exe-

* Read it through without stopping, and then re-read various passages, and admired and wondered at the performance....
One is confounded at the author's mixture of good and bad tisse. . . The extraordinary protonny with which he introduces the most sacred subject has at once and completely annihilated the poem, so far as the public generally are concerned."

"The Odes to the Skylark and The Cloud, in the opinion of many critics, bear a purer pectical stamp than any other of his productions. They were written as his mind prompted, histening to the carolling of the bird aloft in the naure sky of Italy, or marking the cloud as it sped across the heavens, while he floated in his boat on the Thames. No poet was ever warned by a more genuine and unforced in-piration. His extreme sensibility gave the intensity of passion to his intellectual pursuits, and rendered his mand keenly alive to every perception of outward objects, as well as to his internal sensations. Such a gift is, among the sad vicisatindes of human lie, the disappointments we meet, and the galling sense of our own mistakes and errors, fraught with pain: to excape from such, he delivered up his soul to poetry, and felt happy when he sheltered himself from the influences of human sympathies in the wildest regions of fancy."—Mas. Sinkley: Pref. to Sheltey's Pat. Sinks.

"It is needless to disguise the fact, and it accounts for all—his mind was diseased: he never knew, even from boylead, what it was to breathe the atmosphere of healthy life, to have the mean same in corpore same. His sensibilities were over-acute; his mornlity was thoroughly morbid; his metaphysical speculations illogical, inconcruous, themprehensible—alike baseless and objectless. The same and systems of his universe were mere nebulæ; his continents were a chaos of dead matter; his occans "a world of waters, and without a shore." — It is gratuations absurdity to call his mystical speculations a search after truth; they are no such thing, and are as little world the fact truth; they are no such thing, and are as little world water in the fact, with Half-Cintury, 3d ed., 1856, 231, 232.

"He has the art of using the statellest works and the most learned idense without incurring the charge of pedantry, so that passages of more splendid and sonorous writing are not to be selected from any writer since the days of Milton; and yet, when he descends from his ideal worlds, and comes home to us in our humble bowers, and in yearning after love and affection, he attunes the most natural feelings to a style so proportionate, and withat to a modulation so truly musical, that there is nething to surpass it in the lyres of Beaumont and Fletcher."—Linea Hays: "I can no more understand Shelley than you can. He poetry is thin-sown with profit or delight. . "Shelley's poetry was icy cold to him, (Charles Lamb., except one or two of the minor poems, in which he could not help admiring the exquisite beauty of the expression."—See T. N. Tulfour's Character of Lamb.

"Many of his contemporaries, and nearly all the postical writers of any eminence since his time, hear viable traces of how much they mitued themselves with Shelley's pootry. I will mention, as instances of this, Keata, Mias Landon, Monckton Milnes, Browning, and Tennyson. No one, indeed, who is unacquainted with Shelley can be aware of the full richness and melody of our language."—Sire E. S. Creasy: Elonious: Percy Bysake Shelley, 1850.

"The strong inagination of Shelley made him an idelater in his own despite. Out of the most indefinite terms of a hard, cold, dark, metaphysical system, he made a gorgeous Fantheon, fall of beautiful, malestic, and life-like forms. He turned athesim itself into a mythology, rich with visions as glorious as the gods that live in the marible of Phidias, or the Wirgin saints that smalle on us from the canvas of Murillo. The Spirit of Beauty, the Principle of Good, the Principle of Evil, when he treated of them, ceased to be abstractions. They took shape and colour. They were no longer mere words, but 'intelligible forms,' fair humanities,' objects of love, of adoration, or of fear. As there can be no stronger sign of a mind destruite of the postical faculty than that tendoucy which was so common among the writers of them, ceased to be abstractions. They took shape and colour. They were no longer mere words, but 'intelligible forms,' fair humanities,' objects of love, of adoration, or of fear. Sheastone, William, 1714-1763, first saw the light on the patrimonial estate which his taste afterwards made so famous,—The Leasuwes, Ilales Owen, Shropahire. In 1732 he was entered of Pembroka College, Oxford, and

Oxford, and "here, it appears, he found delight and advantage; for he continued his name in the book ten years, though he took no degree, After the first four years he put on the civilian's gown, but without aboving any intention to engage in the profession, ... Mr. Dolman, to whose care he was indebted for his easo and leisure, died in 1746, and the care of his own fortune now fell upon himself. He tried to escape it a while, and inved at his house with his tenants, who were distantly related; but, finding that imperfect possession inconvenient, he took the whole estate into his own bands, more to the improvement of its heavily than the increase of its produce. Now was excited his delight in rural pleasures, and his ambition of rural elegance; he began from this time to point his prospects, to diversify his aurface, to entangle his walks, and to wind his wastern; which he did with such judgment and such funcy and the sittle domain the entry of the great and the admiration of the skillid,—as place to be visited by twavellers and capied by designers."—Dr. Johnson: Life of Stenstons. See Cunninghum's ed. of Johnson's bives, 1854, iii. 205-304.

He subjected himself to some pecuniary inconvenience

He subjected himself to some pecuniary inconvenience by his lavish expenditures on his favourite acres; but the investment seems not to have been a losing one to the estate :

"In the value of purchase, how much Mr. Shenstone's estate was improved by his taste, will be judged from the prace it fatched when sold by auction in 170b, being $17,000 sterling; though when it descended to him it was only valued at 500f. a year."—Block of tree to Dr. Anderson.
But, slas! its glory has departed:

"The Lonsower now belongs to the Attwood family, and a Miss Attwood readous there occasionally; but the whole place bears the impress of descrition and neglect. The house has a full look; the same heavy spirit breads over the lawns and glades; and it is only when you survey it from a distance, no when approaching Halesower from Hagley, that the whole presents an aspect of unusual heavy."—Howill's Homes and Maunis of the Most Enricht Profits Profits 1817, vol. 1.

He left Harrow when about eighteen, and at this time, although unable to spell Ruglish, displayed condenses of some progress in Greek in conjunction with his friend H. "Her personal charms, the exquisiteness of her musical salents, and the full light of publicity which her profession threw upon both," remarks Mr. Moore, "naturally attracted round her a crowd of admirers, in whom the sympathy of common pursuit soon kindled into rivalry, till she became at length an object of wantly as well as of lova. Her extreme youth, too, (for she was little more than sixteen when Shelidan hist mer,) must have removed, even from minds the most fastidious and delicate, that repugnance they might have justly folt to her profession if she had lived much longer under its tarmshing influence, or lost, by frequent exhibitions before the public, that fine gloss of feminine molesty, for whose absence not all the talents and accomplishments of the whole sex can accomplishments of the whole sex can accomplishment of the whole sex can accomplishment of the whole sex can accomplishments of the whole sex can accomplishment of the whole sex can accomplish ment of the whole sex can accomplishment of the whole sex can accomplish ment of the whol

A few weeks previous to this event, Sheridan had been entered a student of the Middle Temple; and an income from a profession—for he would not permit his wife to exercise her profession—would have been * great addition to the happiness of the young people: a "law student," however, he cannot fairly be styled, and he was never called to the Bar. He now applied himself to dramatic composition, and in January. 1775, produced at Covent Christian. position, and in January, 1775, produced at Covent Garden his first comedy,-The Rivals,-which, after being den his first comedy,—The Rivals,—which, after being damned the first night in consequence of the bad acting of Mr. Lee in Sir Lucius O'Trigger, took the town by storm. Sir Lucius, Sir Anthony Absolute, Captain Absolute, Captain Alexander of the solute, Falkland, Bob Aeres, Fag. Lydia Languish, and Mrs. Malaprop, became domesticated in the household circle, quoted in the parks, parodied in the streets, plagiarized at the Clubs, and not unknown either to the Lords or the Commons. If the admirers of Humphrey Clinker imagined that they detected the rhetoric of Matthew Bramble in the declamation of Absolute, and the oratory of Mrs. Winifred Jenkins or of Mrs. Tabitha Bramble in the tropes of Mrs. Malaprop, the reunion was a source of pleasure rather than of complaint. In this year, also, he composed St. Patrick's Day; or, The Scheming Licutemant. Thus encouraged, the fortunate author de-Duenna, the success of which was unequalled. The Beggar's Opera (see Gar, John, p. 636, sepra) had a run of sixty-three nights; The Duenus, first produced Novem-ber 21, 1775, was played for seventy-five nights, without any intermission save a few days at Christmas and the Eridays in each week. About the close of this year Sheridan proposed to purchase Mr. tlarrick's chare in the patent of Drury Laue Theatre, (the contract was perfected in June, 1776.) of which he even unliky became patentee and manager.

On the 24th of February, 1777, he brought out, at Drury Lane, A Trip to Scarborough, (altered from Vanbrugh's comedy of The Relapse,) and on the 8th of May ensuing carried his fame to its height by The School for Scandal,—" a sort of El Dorado of wit," says Moore, "where the precious metal is thrown about by nil classes as carelessly as if they had not the least idea of its

We may here close Sheridan's dramatic record-two or three minor pieces are unnoticed—by a reference to his last essays in this line, The Stranger, and Pizarro, adaptations from the plays of Kotzebuc.

Through the influence of Mr. Fox, Sheridan came into Parliament in 1780, as member for Stafford, and he zealously, and sometimes efficiently, supported the principles of the Whigs. Under the Rockingham administration, in March, 1782, he was Under-Secretary of State, but resigned on the death of the marquis in July of the same year. On the death of Pitt, in 1806, he became Treasurer of the Navy; but a change of affairs placed him on the opposite side of the House. He was defeated at the Westminster election in 1807, and lost his seat in Parliament in 1812. In 1792 death deprived him of his wife, whom Wilkes calls "the most modest, pleasing, and delicate flower he had seen." In 1795 he married Miss Ogle, daughter of the Dean of Westminster, "young, accom-plished, and ardently devoted to him," and with the substantial recommendation of £5000. But this small sum, and many other sums, contributed by his friends and raised by various devices, afforded but temporary relief to one of his extravagant and careless habits: his latter years were embittered by a ceaseless contest with his many debtors, and he died, July 7, 1816, in the midst of mortifications and embarrassments which are graphically depicted in the pages of Mr. Moore. The reader of these, however, will do less than justice if he fail to compare with them the explanatory statements of Mr. J. W. Croker, in the London Quarterly Review for March, 1924, 561-98,

SUPRIDAY THE ORATOR.

SHERIDAN THE ORATUR.

"His reputation as an orator may be said to rest substantially on his two spece her against M. Watten Hastings, and it infortunately happens, as we have already hinted, that both of these are me raidy reported in the parliamentary debates. When he delivered these far inmed philippies, he was a new man in St Stephen's – the extent of his general and the truth of his heracter were yet to be die of ped, and we must be permitted to doubt whether, if he had spoken the same words a lew years later, the world would have hear I so much about the matter. Whenever Sheridan attempts any serious possion in his dramas, he fails deplorably, and his life was a jest – as it possible that he could ever command, or at the extendant, that genale enthusiasium without which declaraction may flourish, but oratory earned be?—J. Wilson Chokes. Lon Quar Ree., March, 1826, 501.

"Sheridan's speech on the Begums in the Hause of Commons admitable; in Westminster Hall, continued in 1 heard both." —Lone Greature Recollectly & Roy 1s, 1859, 181

The Second Begum Speech was made in Westminster Hill, June 3 et aq., 1785, the First Begum Speech (for a arriten copy of which Sheridan refused the offer of £1000) was delivered in the House of Commons, Feb. 7, a written copy of which Sheridan refused the offer of £1000) was delivered in the House of Commons, Feb. 7, 1787, and on the latter we quote some opinions:

"Mt Burke ded lared it to be "the mest actorishing affort of cloquence, argument, and wit united, of which there was any record or tradition." Mr Fox end, All that he had ever heard, all that he had ever read, when compared with it, dwindled into he thing, and a nished like vapour before the sun," and Mr. Pitt acknowl sign! 'that it surpassed all the eloquence of anciont or modern times, and possessed every thing that genius or art could furnsh, to agitate and centrout the human mind."—Monat Monata of Sheridan.

"A speech which was so imperfectly reported that it may be said to be wholly lost, but which was, without doubt, the most civiloustely brilliant of all the produced was such as has nover been equalled. He sat down, not merely amidet cheering, int smidt the touch cloping of hards, in which the lords below the bir and if the strangers in the gallery joined. The excitoment of the House was such that no other speaker could obtain a hearing, and the deliate was all parted. The forment specad fast through the flown. Within four and-twenty hours Sharidan was offered a thousand pounds for the copyright of the speech, if he would himself correct it for the press. The impression made by this remarkable deplay of eloquence on excret and experienced critics, whose discontinuous and specification was performanced of Sheridan, the flows that had been delivered within the memory of man. Mr. For about the same time, being asked by the late Lord Holland whit was the best speech swemale in the House of Commons, assigned the first place, without heartstion, to the great Ornico of sheridan on the Order Selection of the control of the intervention of the interpolation, and he flow of the north partial on the Order Selection of the record of the control of the first place, with a were seldom wanting ofter in the interver or in the parliamentary performances of Sheridan, now become greatly prevalent that a portion of this success was swing to the spench having so greatly surpassed all the speaker's former efforts; to the extreme interest of the topics which the subject naturally presented; and to the artist-like elaboration and beautiful delivery of certain fine peasages, rather than to the merits of the whole. Cortain it is that the repetition of great part of it, presented in the short-band notes of the speach on the same charge in Westminster, disappoints every reader who has beard of the success of the earlier effort. In truth, Mr. Sharidan's taste was very far from being charts, or even moderately correct; he delighted in gaudy figures; he was attracted by glare, and cared not whether the brilliancy cams from timed or gold, from broken glass or pare diamond; he ownists his floughts with epigrammatuc diction; he played to the galicries, and inhulged them, of course, with an endiess auccession of ciap-traps. His worst passages by far were those which he evidently preferred himself.—Load Baccunax: States. Thuse Gos. III., 204.

"The toost deliberate criticism must allow his eloquence to be distinguished by strong sense and brilliant wit; by a vigour of argument not too ingenions for business, nor too subtle for coavielion; by a great command of pure English words, and by a vivil power of imagination in those passages which simed at grandeur and pathos; though they must be owned to be too artificial and oxtentations to produce the highest effect and to be approved by a severe marked by flowing chaquence, and not saftenessing they may be succession of his lokes were the result of great study, yet, as they were perfect in those link, and that kind of the very highest, we may forgive the labour. Few men have possessed the power to make such a speech as that which duzzled the House of Commons on the Begum Charge; few ever wrote so good a consely as 'The School for Scandal.' It is melancholy to reflect that the possessor of such taleuts should, as it were on more wantonness.

"Lord Holland told me a curlous piece of sentimentality in Bheridan. The other night we were all delivering our respective and various opinions on him and other homore marquana, and infae was this. "Whatever Sheridan has done or chosen to do has been par excellence, always the best of its kind! He has written the best comedy, (Sohool for Seandal,) the less drama, (in my mind, for before that St. Ghies's lampon, The Beggar' Opera,) the best force, (The Critic—it is only too good for a force,) and the best Address, (Mondogno on Barrick), and, to criwin all, delivered the very best Gration (the famous Regum Breech) and the best Address, (Mondogno on Barrick), and, to criwin all, delivered the very best Gration (the famous Regum Breech) ever conceived or heard in this country. Somebody told S, this the next day, and on hearing at he birst into tears! Pour Brinneley! If they were tears of pleasure,! I would rather have said these few but most sincere words than have written the Hillad or made his own celebrated philipple. Nay, his own comedy never gratified me more than to hear that he had derived a moment's gratification from any praise of mine, the milds as it must appear to 'my ediers and betters,'"—Lord Byron's Journal, Dec. 17, 18, 1813; Moor's Byron, it.

Sheridan, Thomas, son of the preceding, godson of Japathan Swift, father of R. B. Sheridan, and husband of Frances Sheridan, 1721-1788, a native of Quiloa, Ireland, was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Dublin, and made his first appearance on the stage of the theatre in Smock Alley, Dublin, January, 1743, in the character of Richard III. In 1744 he played at Covent Garden, and in 1745 with Garriok at Drury Lane, and subsequently became—not successfully—a theatrical manager. The great passion of his life from youth up was oratory and the exposition of its supposed advantages to public audiences. His last appearance on the stage occurred in 1776. On the retirement of Garrick, the purchasers of the share in Drury Lane (of whom his R. B. Sheridan was one) made him manager of the theatre, and this post he retained for three years, after which he returned to his Lectures and his books. On the accession of George III. he was honoured with a pension, which disgusted his fellow-pensioner Dr. Johnson, and elicited an exclamation which Sheridan resented.

Shirley, Henry. The Martyr'd Souldier; as acted in 1631, Lon., 1638, ito. See Langhaine's Drain. Poets, Shirley, James, 1598-1686, a native of London, educated at Merchant Taylors' School, St. John's College, Oxford, and Catherine Hall, Cambridge; took hely orders, and obtained a curacy near St. Alban's, which he resigned in consequence of his conversion to the Roman Catholic Church. He now established a Grammar School at St. Alban's, which proved unsuccessful, and he removed to London and commenced writing poems and plays. The first of his poems - Eecho; or, The Infortunate Loverse-was pub. 1618, 8vo. After producing a number of damas, his labours were interrupted in 1640 by the Civil War, and he accepted service on the Royalist side, under the Duke of Nowcastle, Returning to peaceful pursuits, the ordinance of the Long Parliament and emetiments of a similar character, pro-hibiting the exhibition of "public stage plays," threw him again upon school-teaching as a means of subsist-ence; and his academy in White Friers turned out many pupils who "afterwards proved most eminent in divers faculties." In 1646 he again resumed the publication of plays and poems. In 1666 he was driven, with his second wife, by the great fire, from their house in Fleet Street into the parish of St. Giles, Street into the parish of St. 1910s, "where, being in a manuor overcome with affrightments, disconsolations," and other iniseries occasion'd by that fire and their leases, they both died within the compass of a natural day,"—Woot: Alon. Ozon., Blus's ad., iif. 749.

A collective edition of his Poems, concluding with The Triumph of Beavile, was pub., Lon., 1616, 8vo, (see Bibl. Anglo-Poet., 642, 643, 644;) and he pub. Six New Playes, viz.: The Brothers, Sixters, Doubtful Heir, Imposture, Cardinall, and Court Secret, in one vol., in 1653,

His grammatical treatises were pub. as follows: 1. Via ad Latinam Linguam complanata: The Way made Plain to the Latine Tongue, &c., 1649, Svo. 2. Grammatica Anglo-Latina; an English and Latin Grammar, &c., 1651, &vo. 3. The Rudiments of Grammar: The Rules composed in English Verse, &c., 1656, 12mo; 2d ed.,—Manuductio, &c.,—1600, 12mo. 4. An Essay towards an Universal and Rational Grammar, together with Rules for Learning Latin in English Verse, by Mr. with Rules for Learning Latin in English Verse, by Mr. Shirley: to which is annex'd the Latin Particles, &c., (by Jenkin Tho. Philipps,) 1726, Svo. He also assisted his patron, the Earl (afterwards the Dake) of Newcastle, (806 CAVENDISH, WILLIAM,) in the composition of several plays published by his lordship, and wrote notes for John Ogilby's translations of Homer and Virgil. Of the nearly two-score plays to which the name of Shirley is attached, perhaps not half a dozen were familiar to the general reader before the appearance of Mr. Dyce's edition of his Works; nor has that publication much extended his circle of readers. Yet Wood (ubi supra) calls him "the most noted dramatic poet of his time, and languaine, twenty-five years after Shirley's death, prefixed the following, with other lines, to his catalogue of his plays:

of his plays;
"One of such Incomparable parts that he was the Chief of the Second-rate Poets; and by some has been thought even squal to Fletcher himself... I need not take pains to show his intimacy not only with the Poets of his Time, but even the Value and Admiration that Persons of the first Rank had for him, since the Verses before several of his Wooks and his Epistles Dedicatory sufficiently show it."—Dramatic Poets, 1601, 474, 475.

Charles Lamb concludes his Characters of Dramatic Writers contemporary with Shakspeare with the remark, James Shirley claims a place amongst the worthles of this period, not so much for any transcendent talent in himself, as that he was the lost of agreet race, all of when spoke nearly the same hauguage and had a set of moral feelings and notions in common. A new hauguage, and quite a new turn of trage and confic interest, came in with the Restoration."—Works of Charles Lamb, ed. Boston, 1800, iv. 127.

Mr. Campbell spoaks in a more decisive tone:

"Shtrley was the last of our good old dramatisty. When his works shall be given to the public, they will undoudedly enrich our popular literature. His language sparkles with the most exquisite images. Keeping some occasional prariences apart, the fault of his age rather than of himself, he speaks the most polished and refined dislect of the stage; and even some of his over-heightened sense of voluptionsness are meant, though with a very mistaken judgment, to inculente morality. I consider his genina, indeed, as rather brilliant and elegant than strong or lofty. His tragedies are defective in fire, grandestr, and passion; and we must select his conneclies, to have any favourable files of his humour. His finest poetry comes forth in situations rather more familiar than irragedy and more grave than comedy, which I should call sentimental comedy, if the name were not associated with ideas of modern inspidity. That he was capable, however, of pure and excellent comedy will be fort by times who have yet in reserve the anusement of reading his fame-set, Hyde-park, and Lady of Picsaure. In the first and last of these there is a subtle ingenuity in producing comic effect and surprise, which might be turned Attic, if it did not surpass any thing that is jeft up in Athenian consely. I shall leave to others Mr. Campbell speaks in a more decisive tone:

the more special enumeration of his halts." Specimens of English Poets, Lon., 1819, (a.v.)

"shirley has no originality, no force in conceiving or delinating character, little of pathos, and less perhaps of wit; his drams produce no deep impression in reading, and of course can leave none in the memory. But his mind was poetical; his better characters, especially females, express pure thoughts in pure language; he is never tumid or affected, and seldom obscure; the incidents succeed rapidly, the personages are numerous, and there is a general animation in the scenes which causes no read him with some pleasure. No very good play, nor, possibly, any very good scene, could be found in Shirley; but he has many lines of considerable beauty. Among his comedies, the Gamesters may be reckoned the best. . . The Ball, and also more more among the comedies of Shirley, are so far remarkable and worthy of being read, that they bear witness to a more polished elegance of manners, and a more free intercents on the ingher class, than we find in the comedies of the preceding reign. A queen from France, and that queen Hernfetta Maria, was better fitted to give this tone than Anne of Denmark. But it is not from Shirley's pictures that we can draw the most favourable notions of the morals of that age."—Halam: Lid Hist of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iil. 120. See, also, 524.

"Most of his plays are tragi-comedies,—now sprightly and throadly humorous, now serious and solemn. The happlest chorts of his genus will perhaps be found in the tragic portions of these variegated damas: they contain many a scene of elegant tenderness, of deep and quiet pathos, and express the feelings of honour, love, and friendship, in thoir highest ferrour and rehnement."—Rev. Sibbit, Adam. I. Diesert on Luxury, Lon., 1896, 8vo. 2. Thoughts on Divorces, 1800, 8vo. Sibba, or Sibbos, Richard, D.D., h. at Sudbury, Suffelk, 1577; educated at, and Follow of, St. John's College, Cambridge; on being ordained, was chosen Les-turer of Trinity Church, Cambridge, the living of which he held during the last two years of his life; Preacher of Gray's Inu, 1618; Master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, 1625; d. 1635. As a preacher he was famous, as a writer excellent; and it is a marvel that in this ago of republication an edition of his works has not been given to the public,—especially as they have never been ex-lected. There are, indeed, 3 vols. 8vo., (Lon., 1899; Aber-deen, 1812.) entitled Sibbs's Works; but the collection is incomplete, incorrectly printed, and contains noither the Prefaces, Bedications, nor Tables. Since the date of these volumes, Mr. Pickering has pub. several of his treatises, in 2 vols 12mo, 1837-35, viz.: I. The Soul's Con-flict, and Victory over itself by Faith: a Treatise of the Inward Disquietments of Distressed Spirits, with Comfortable Remedies to establish Them; 11. The Brussed Reed and Smoking Flux; The Fountain Scaled: and a Description of Christ. A new ed. of his Divine Meditations was pub. 1838, 32mo.

Since the above was written there have been announced The Complete Works of Richard Sibbes, D.D.; Edited, with a Memoir, by Rev. A. B. Grosart, (Nichol's Stand.

Div., Paritan Periol.) Edin., 1862, 7 vols. 8vo.

"To my son Izaak I give Dortor Sibbes his Soul's Conflict, and to my daughter his Braised Reed; descring them to read them so as to be well acquanted with thom "-- Isaak Willon's Will.

Richard Baxter tells us (Autobiography) that Sibbs's Bruised Reed was the cause of his conversion; which, says Granger, (Biog. Hist.) is enough to make it memo-rable.— Archbishop Usher, Dr. Doddridge, Thomas Euf-ler, Erasmus Muldleton, Edward Leigh, Joh Orton, Neal, Brook, (Lives of the Puritans,) Williams, (C. P., ed. 1843, 306,) Bickersteth, (C. S., ed. 1844, 245.) all units before us and this moment in commendation of Sibba; but we lack space for their testimonies. See, also, Clark's Lives, at the end of the Martyrology. His Commentaries upon Hosen, 1639, (also 1611,) 4to, and those upon II, Corinthians chap. i., 1665, fol., (also 1656, 4to.) are among the works (see others in Watt's Bibl. Brit. and in Darling's Cyc. Bibl., i. 2736-38) which are not in the collection of his Works, in 3 vols. Svo, above referred to.

"Of this blest man let this just praise be given: Heaven was in hun before he was in Heaven." Dr. Dedoribur: MN, note in his copy of Sibba's Returning

Sidney, Mary, sister of Sir Philip Sidney, born probably about 1552, was married in 1576 to Henry, Earl of Pembroke, whom she survived twenty years, dying in 1621. The famous epitaph by which she is best known to the general reader is generally ascribed to Ben Jon-son; but it is also claimed for William Browne, author of Britannia's Pastoralls, and will be found in a MS. volume of his poems in the Lansdowne Collection, No. 777. In many modern copies six lines added by her son William, Earl of Pembroke, (see his poems,) are given us as part of the original epitaph,—which really runs thus:

"Underweath this cable heree Checracian rais saule nerse Lycs the subject of all verse;— Sydney's Sister' Pembroko's Mother! Death, see thou hast kill'd another, Pair, and learn'd, and good as she, .* Timo shall throw his dart at thee!"

of his early days—as, indeed, of the whole of his brilliant career—we have a glowing culogy from the biographer who covered no higher title than that of THE FRIEND OF SIR PHILLY SIDNEY, (see GREVILLE, FULKE;)

FRIEND OF SIR PHILIP SIDNEY, (see GREVIILE, FULKE:)

"Of whose youth I will report no other wonder than this:
That though I lived with him, and knew him from a child, yot
I never knew him other than a man: with such staledness of mund, lovely and familiar gravity, as carried grace, and reverence above greater years. His talk ever of knowledge, and his very play tending to enrich his mind; so as even his teachers found something in him to observe, and learn, above that which they had usually read, or taught. Which emmence by nature and industry made his worthy father stile Sir Philip in my hearing (though I unseen) Lumen familia sue."

At the are of twelve years, whilst at Shrewshney School.

At the age of twelve years, whilst at Shrewsbury School, he addressed to his father (then Lord President of Wales) the two epistles, one in Latin, the other in French, which elicited that Godly Letter of Sir Henry's, already noticed in our brief sketch of his life. In 1569 he was entered at Christ Church, Oxford, and, after there distinguishing bimself, is said by Dr. Zouch (but not by Wood and his other earlier biographers) to have passed to Cambridge, But, according to the custom of his age and rank, his studies were to be continued abroad; and

"he had a licence from Queen Elizabeth, dated May 25, 1872, to go into parts beyond the seas, with three servants and four horses, and to remain the space of two years for his attaining the knowledge of foreign languages,"—ARTHUE COLLINS: Momoirs of the Nidneys, prefixed to Letters and Memorials of State, dc., 1746, i. 98.

He presented himself at Paris, duly furnished with a letter of introduction from his uncle the Earl of Leicester, to the English ambassador, Sir Francis Walsingham, and was safely lodged in the house of that sagacious stateswas safely lodged in the house of that sagacious states-man during the horrors of the St. Bartholomew massacre, August, 1472. Saddened by this appalling exhibition of human depravity, he continued his travels, visiting Belgiam, Germany, (at Frankfort securing the friend-ship of his learned correspondent Hubert Languet,) Hungary, and Italy. At Venice he devoted himself to horsemanship and other manly exercises. At Padua he appropriated eight months to Cicero, Plutarch, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Dante, and Ariosto. In February, 1574, he returned to Venice: "and now,"

In February, 1974, he returned to Venice; "and now," said, or thought, he, "I must see Rome also?"—a dectermination which his Protestant friend Languet, he Sidney's after-regret, successfully combated. At Venice he made the acquaintance of Edward, brother of Sir Henry Wotton, (the E. W. of his Defence of Poesic,) and, it is asserted, (but this is a matter of doubt.) of the poet Tasco. In May, 1575, he returned to England; and, thus thoroughly furnished, and favoured by his near relationship to Laborator it is not appeared. ship to Leicester, it is no marrel that he soon became noted as a most successful courtier. He reached home noted as a most successful courtier. He reached home in time to participate in the gorgoous feativities of Keniworth, "pedantically" chronicled by the "coxcomb" Robert Lancham, (cide p. 1056, supra.) and romantically pictured by the graphic pencil of Walter Scutt. In 1576 the was sent by Queen Elizabeth to condule the death of the Emperor Maximilian II., and to congratuate his successor, Redolph II., upon his new dignity. But, under the shadow of this compliment, the waited, at the same time, upon such of the German Princes as were interested in the delence and preservation of the Protestant religion or their own native liberties; and prevailed upon them to enter into a religious League with England."

On his arrival in England in the next year, the ability displayed in this mission called forth the warmest culoies of Walsingham, who rejoiced the heart of Sir Henry Sidney by a letter announcing

Sidney by a letter announcing "the return of the young gentleman, your sonne, whose message verte sufficientlie performed, and the relatings thereof, is no less gratefully received and well liked of Her Majeste, than the honourable opinion he both left behinds him with all the princes with whotame he had to negotiate, hathe left a most

Such a "sonne' was not to be rejected as a "sonne-inlaw." and six years later (in 1.5%) the young diplomatist.

law," and six years later (in 15%3) the young diplomatist, crossed in love by the marriage of the Lady Penelope Devereux-the Philoclea of his Arcadia and the Stella of his posms—to Lord Rich, became the husband of Frances, the only daughter of Walsingham. This lady after his death became the wife of the Earl of Essex, Lady Rich's brother; and after his execution marriage the Earl of Clan Ricard. But before his marriage Sidney had added to his eminent foreign successes on her Majesty's behalf a piece of domestic service of the most valuable kind,—the famous letter to the Queen dissuading her from the contemplated marriage with the Duke of Aujou, whose hold and romantic style of wooing at a later day (in 1581) threatened to overcome the personal defects of the swain and the political astuleness of the lady. Fortunately for England and England's Queen. the courtship proved unsuccessful; and to this result the logic and eloquence of Sidney's letter (see Strype's Annals of the Reformation and Hallam's Constit. Hist. of Eng.) not a little contributed.

This excellent epistle was written in 1579; and another fortunate event occurred in the next year,—the quarrel with the Earl of Oxford, which caused Sidney to retire in disgust from court and seck that repose at Wilton (the seat of his brother-in-law, the Earl of Pembroke) to which we are indebted for the romance consecrated to fraternal affection by the title of The Counters of Pembroke's Arcadia. Commenced in 1580, this work was resumed from time to time, but left incomplete, on scat-

Park corrects Wood's error in a note, (q.r.;) see, also, secount of the editions of the Arcadis, infra. Sidney expressed a desire that the Arcadia should be destroyed. In 1681 Sir Philip represented the county of Kent in expressed a desire that the Arcadia should be destroyed. In 1581 Sir Philip represented the county of Kent in Parliament; in the same year he "was one of those noble gallants that performed, in the royal justings, barriers, and turney, for the entertainment of the Duke of Anjou," (as we have seen, again an unsuccessful suitor to the Virgin Queen;) and in this year also he found time from cares of state and reveirs to development. time from cares of state and revelry to devote many hours to his Defence of Poesie, which was circulated in

had been consummated !-but another fate was in reserva and note consummated:—out another late was in reserva-for one from whose eminent abilities many years of use-fulness were reasonably anticipated. The Queen straitly forbade the voyage to America; and it is asserted by several ancient chroniclers (e.g. Naunton's Frag. Regal-and Fuller's Worthies) that in this year her Majesty's fear of "losing the jewel of her times" alone prevented his being placed in nomination for the crown of Poland; but this romantic story does not appear to be well founded. In June, 1885, a treaty was concluded between Elizabeth and the Seven United Provinces, and Sir Philip Sidney was appointed, by the former, Governor of Flushing, one of the cautionary towns held as security for the English advances. His new duties, on which he entered November 18, 1585, were most efficiently discharged; but the history of his brief and well-managed government enters not into the plan of this work. He was fatally wounded at the memorable battle of Zutphen, September 22, 1586, was carried to Arnheim, and there died on the 17th October ensuing. The touching instance of self-sacri-ficing generosity to a wounded soldier is too well known to permit another repetition in this place. His body was conveyed to Flushing, where it remained eight days; reached the Tower wharf, London, on the 5th of Novomber, and lay in state in the Minories until the 16th of February, when it was interred with great pomp in St. Paul's Cathodryl. Thus lived and thus died the famous Philip Sidney! He "trod from his gradle to his grave amid incense and flowers, and died in a dream of glory, (Efficient Poeticus.) He left one child, Elizabeth, afterwards Counters of Ruthand, who died without issue in 1613. The sensation produced throughout Europe by his death has perhaps never been equalled by the fall of any other uncrowned head. Among the tributes to his memory now displayed before us, as gathered from the past, are to be found those of kings and princes, noblemen and state-men, soldiers and scholars. From these we would gladly quote, but, in default of space, must be content to refer the reader to authorities from which be can draw at his pleasure. Some opinions, however, on The Arcadia and The Defence of Poesic must not be omitted. The Counters of Pembroke's Areadia was first published Lon., 1590, 4to. Fulke Greville is not disposed to admit that Sidney's en conveys a fair impression of the author. Of the Areadia he remarks, ration of the other. On the country, not also shock the lovers of both by such irreverence as this:

"No man seems to me so astonishing an object of temporary admiration as the celebrated friend of the Lord Brooke, the famous Sir Philip Sidney. The learned of Europe dedicated their works to him; the republic of Polaud thought him at least worthy to be in the nomination for their crown. All the masses of England wept his death. When we, at this distance of time, inquire what prodigious morits excited such admiration, what do we find! Great valour.—But it was an age of heroes. In full of all other talents, we have a tedious, lamentable, pedantic, pastoral romance, which the patience of a young virgin in love cannot now wade through; and some absurd attempts to better English verse in Roman chains; a proof that this applianced unition understood little of the genue of his own language. The few of his letters extant are poor matters; one to a steward of his father, an instance of unwarrantable violence. By far the best presumption of his abilities (to us who can judge only by what we see) is a pamphile published among the Sidney papers, being an answer to the famous libel called Liverter's transamentally. It defends his uncle with great spirit. What has been said in derogation to their blood seems to have touched Sir Philip most. He died with the rashness of a volunteer, having lived to write with the sang-froid and proluxity of Mademouselle Scuderi."—Royal and Noble Authors: Lord Brooke.

Walpole's dislike of the Arcadia was no greater than

Hazlitt's:

Hazlit's:

"Sir Philip Sidney is a writer for whom I cannot acquire a taste. As Ma Burke said he 'could not love the French Republic;' so I may say that I cannot love 'the Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia,' with all my good will to it... It is to me one of the greates' monuments of the abuse of intellectual power upon record. It puts one in mind of the court dresses and preposterous fashlons of the time, which are grown obsolete and degusting. It is not romantic, but setholastic; not poetry, but casuistry: not nature, but art, and the worst sort of art, which thinks it can do better than nature. Of the number' of fine things that are constantly passing through the author's mind, there is hardly one that he has not contrived to spoil, and to spoil purposely and maliciously, in order to aggrandize our idea of himself. Out of five hundred tolo pages, there are hardly, I conceive, half a dozen sentences expressed simply and directly, with the sincere desire to convey the image implied, and without a systematic interpolation of the wit, hearing, ingenuity, wisdem, and everlasting impertinence of the writer, so as to disguise the object, instead of displaying it in its true colours and real proportions."—Lects, on the Dramat. But let us have something on the other side of the question:

"There are passages in this work exquisitely beautiful,—useful observations on life and manners, a variety and accurate discrimination of characters, fine sentiments, expressed in strong and adequate terms, animated descriptions, equal to any that occur in the ancient or modern poets, sage lessons of morality, and judicious reflections on government and policy. A reader who takes up the volume may be compared to a traveller who has a long and dreary road to pass. The objects that successively meet his eye may not in general be very pleasing, but occasionally he is charmed with a more beautiful prospect, with the verdure of a rich valley, with a meadow enamelled with flowers, with a murmur of a rivulet, the swelling grove, the hanging rock, the splendid villa. These charming disjects abundantly compensate for the joyless regions he has traversed. They fill him with delight, exhibarate his drooping splitus, and, at the decline of day, he reposes with complacency and astisfaction."—Thou as Zoucu, D.D.: Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Sir Philip Nidney, York, 1869, 4to.

"The Arcadia, with all the imperfections that can be laid to its charge, is a rich mint of deep feeling and of varied excellence. It displays a fancy, it is true, which often runs riot amid the diversity of its creations, and a taste that sometime erred from the infinite seductions to which it was exposed. But the work invariably makes atonement by the stately eloquasce of its descriptions, and by the delicious incease which it disread ego to the cause of virtne and true hereion. —William Gasti. tid the manageread dresses of the actors, we pronounce those to be real portonages, and that the dramatic style distinctly conveys to us incidents which, however veiled, had occurred to the post's own observation, as we perceive that the scenes which be has painted with such precision guar have been localities. The characters are minutely analyzed, and so correctly preceived that their interfor emotions are paramed forth in their gestures as well as revealed in their language. The author was nimed if the tender lover whose amorous griefs he touched with such delicacy, and the undoubted child of charalry he drew; and in these floor passions he seems only to have multiplied himself. ... It is the imperiabile diction, the language of Shakspeare, before Shakspeare wrote, which diffuses the enclanament over 'The Arcadia;' and it is for this that it should be studied; and the true critic of Sidney, because the critic was a true poet, ofters his unquestioned testimony in Cowper,—

*The first good prose writer, in any positive sense of the word, is Sir Philip Sidney. . . . It does not appear to me that the Arcadia is more tiresome and uninteresting the reference laser is to Walpole's complaint, at supral than the generality of that class of long romances, proverbally among the most tiresome of all books; and in a less fiabilities age it was read, no doubt, even as a story, with some delight. It displays a superior mind, rather complying with a temporary taste than affected by it, and many pleusang passages over, especially in the tender and innocent loves of Pyros les and Philoches. I think it, nevertheless, on the whole, interior in sense, style, and spirit to the Defence of Powy. . . Hakewill goes much two far in calling Sidney's Arcadia in nothing interior to the choicest piece among the ancients. "—Hallers: Let Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1864, ii. 106, 217, in. 337. DEFENCE OF PORRY.

"It belongs to the small number of those happy creations which he alone could either have produced or devised who has been touched and purified with the sacred fire of true genus. Originally designed as an answer to certain distribes of the Puritains,—a sect which was then springing rapidly into notice, and beginning to signalize itself by an ansters and fierce aversion to all the degant recreations of secrety and of mini,—it remains an imperishable monument of the digested learning of its author, and of the engaging facility with which he could turn his talents to account. It has been apily described in his own words as the sweet food of sweetly uttered knowledge, as the outpouring and register of those 'high-excited in his own words as the same time, it contains few of those mannersms and studied affectations of his day with which, it must be confessed, his larger work is often deformed. This is, on the contrary, a plan and practical treaties, seeking above all things to carry conviction by its lituarisations and its arguments, and making fancy and ornament entirely aubservient to the cause of persuasion and of truth. Yet the imaginative genius of the author fraquently bursts forth in all its splendour, and strews he didactic path with a galaxy of the most brilliant conceptions. He seems here to follow religiously the memorable advice with which his mans favoured him on another occasion.— Look in thy heart and write. "—William Gar: Miscell, Works of Str P. Sidery.

"didney's Datence of Possie, so has been surmised by his last editor, was probably written about 1541. I should incline its place it later than The Arcadia; and he may perhaps allude its himself where he says, 'some have mingled matters berited and pasters!. This treates is elegantly compared, with perhaps too artificial a construction of sent-most; the sense is good, but the expression is very diffuse, which gives it too much the air of a declamation. The great presse of Sinney in this treatise is, that he has shown the capacity of the English language for april, variety, gracious idion, and masculine firances. It is worth notice that under the word peosy he includes such works as his own Arcadia, or, in short, any flotion: 'It is not rhyming and versifier that maketh possy; one may be a post without exteng, and a versifier without party.'. The Defouce of Poesy has already been reckoned among the polite writings of the Eigabethan age, to which class it rather belongs than to that of criticism; for Sidney rarely comes to any literary consure, and is still farther removed from any protound philosophy. Ills sense is good, but not ingeneous, and the declamatery vone weakens its effect.'"—ILLLUR, Lil. Het. of Europe, it. 197, 281. See, also, 124, 164, and Index.
"The Defence of Poetry is a work of rare merit, It is a golden little volume, which the scholar may lay beneath his pillow, as Chrysostom did the works of Aristophanes. Wa do not, however, mean to analyze it in this place; but recommend our readers to purchase thu 'sweet fixed of sweetly uttood knowledge.' It will be read with delight by all who have a rate for the true beauties of poetry, and may go far to romove the prejudices of those who have not."—Hanky W. Longfellow has presented a very successful "Defoue of Poetry.)

Mr. Longfellow has presented a very successful "Defence of Poetry" in his own popular volumes. We have seen that Horace Walpole abused The Arcadia: he did worse by the Defence of Possy:

worse by the Defence of Poesy:

"I have been blamed for not mentioning Sir Philip's Defence of Poetry, which some think his best work. I had indeed forgot it when I wrote this article; a proof that I at least fill not think at sufficient foundation for so high a character as a sequired. This was all my criticism pretended to say, that I could not concave how a man who in some respects had written dully and weakly, and who, at most, was far inferior to our least authors, had obtained such immensor reputation. Let his merits and his fame be weighed together, and then let it be determined whether the world has overvalued, or I undervalued, Sir Philip Sidney."—Note to 2d ed, of his R. and N. Sigourney. Lividia Huntley.

Sigourney, Lydia Huntley, formerly Miss Huntley, b. September 1, 1791, in Norwich, Connecti-cut, was "almost from infancy remarkable for a love of knowledge, and facility in its acquisition. She read with fluency when but three years of age; and at eight she wrote verses which attracted attention among the acquaintances of her family." At the age of nineteen, in company with an intimate friend, Miss Ann Maria Hyde, (ride No. 2, infra,) she established a female school at Norwich, and two years later removed to Hartford, where she also engaged in the duties of instruction. In 1819 she was married to Mr. Charles Sigourney, of Hartford, where Mrs. Sigourney resided until her death, June 10,

b. April 17, 1806, in Charleston, South Caroline, and admitted to the Bar of that State at the age of twenty-one. That love of letters, however, which had manifested itself from his boyheed soon rendered irksonse the exactions of a proverbially "jealous mistress;" and an editorial connection with the columns of the Charleston Olty Gazette was the commencement of a literary career of great activity and more than ordinary success. His remarkable versatility of talent will be best illustrated by a classified catalogue of the miscellaneous library which he has given to the public.

Mr. Simms is also editor of A Supplement to the Plays of William Shakespears, comprising the Seven Dramas which have been ascribed to his pen, but which are not included in his Writings in Modern Editions; with Notes, and an Introduction to each Play, N. York, 1848, Svo; and he is the author of a number of articles (Charleston, the lives of Senator Butler, Henry Laurens, (Charleston, the lives of sensior nuter, rienry Laurens, John Laurens, and Hugh S. Legare, and perhaps other papers) in Appleton's American Cyclopesdia. To this not meagre list of productions should be added two courses of Lectures, of three each, On Poetry and the Practical, and The Moral Character of Hamlet; and the commencement of an elaborate autobiography. Of some of his works (of which we have generally given the dates of the first publication only) a number of editions have appeared; some have been republished in Bugland; and goveral have been translated into French Rugland; and several have been translated into French and German. To supply the hone demand, a uniform edition of "Simms's Revolutionary and Border Romances of the South," (completed in 1859,) with Illustrations by Darley, is published by J. S. Redfield, New York, in 18 vols. 12mo, vls.: I. The Partisan. II. Mellichampe, III. Katherine Walton. IV. The Scott. V. Wooderst. VI. The Forayers. VII. Entaw. VIII. Guy Rivers. IX. Richard Hurdis. X. Border Beagles XII. Charlemont. XII, Besuchampe. XIII. Confession. XIV. The Yeunassee. XV. Vasconscios. XVI. Southward Ho! XVII. Wigwam and Cabin. XVIII. The Officials of Kirsh. To this series is added. Xolid.

TIX. and XX.—Simme's Poems, Dramatic, Contempla-tive, &c. Repub., (excluding XVIII.,) Prose Works, 1865, 17 vols. 12mo, and Poems, 1864, 2 vols. 12mo. The large space occupied in the enumeration of the works of this author precludes the quotation of critical opiaions; but to a number of these the reader has already been referred, and we extend the list by the addition of Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America, 16th ed., 1855, 843; Griswold's Prose Writers of America, 4th ed., 1852, 30, 34, 40, 43, 603; Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit., 1856, il. 427; Homes of American Authors, 1855, 257, (by William C. Bryant.) with a view of Woodlands, Mr. Simms' Country Residence, Barnwell District, South Carolina; Poo's Marginalia, olxxi.: Trubner's Bibl. Guide to Amer. Lit., ed. 1859, lv.; Internat. Mag., April, 1852, 433; South. Lit. Rev., ix. 155, (Simms as a Political Writer.) Absorbed in the extent of Mr. Simms's literary engagements, we have forgotten to state that the boy designed for a doctor, admitted in maturer years as a lawyer, practizing as a litterateur, and more recently as a planter, has also been a politician. He was for several years a prominent member of the South Carolina Legis-lature; and in December, 1846, escaped by only one voto the responsibilities of Lieutenant-Governor of his State. Mr. Simms's last publications were: 02. The Ghost of my Husband; a Tale of the Crescent City, N. York, 1866, 16mo. 63. War Poetry of the South; Edited, 1867, 12mo, pp. viii, 432. He has in preparation a School History of South Carolina; and is announced as one of the prespective contributors to Southern Society, a weekly, of which No. 1 is to be published at Baltimore, Oct. 1867.

Simond, Louis, although born and educated in France, was Americanized by a twenty years' residence in the United States, and Anglicized by travels in England, marrying an Englishwoman, and a better English style (for which see his books, ut infra) than most natives attain,-and therefore shall not be denied a few lines in a Dictionary of British and American Authors.

"It is in vain to apologise for the coarseness, obscenity, and scurrility of Skelton by saying that his poetry is tinctured with the manners of his age. Skelton would have been a writer without decorum at any period. .. Skelton's charatteristic, vein of humour is capricious and grotesque. If his whimsical extravagancies ever move our laughter, at the same time they subjects are often as ridiculous as his metre; but he sometimes, subjects are often as ridiculous as his metre; but he sometimes, subjects are often as ridiculous as his metre; but he sometimes, debases his matter by his versification. On the whost, his genius some better entired to low birlesque than to liberal und; manny satire. "There is cortainly a rehemen want viva-tly in Shelton which was worthy of being guided by a better tracte; and the objects of his satire beyonk some digree of public spirit. "Blotton is certainly not a post, unless some degree of comic humour, and a torrent like volubility of words in doggred chyme, can make one; but this uncommon fertitity, in a language so dittle suplous as ours was at this time, hespeaks a mind of some original vigour. Few English writers come neares in this respect to Rabelals, whom Skelton preceded. His attempts in serious postry are utrely contemptible; but the satirieal lines on Cardinal Wolsey were probably not ineffective. It is impossible to determine whether they were suitten better 1520. Though these are better known than any posm of Schlou's, his dirgo on Philip Sparrow is the most come and imaginative."—Hattav Lit. Hist of Europe, 4th ed. 1854, 1315. See, also, 423, 439.

"The power, the strangeness, the volubility of his language, the andsetty of his satire, and the perfect originality of his manner, in ide Skelton one of the most extraordinary writers of any area or control with the satire.

indicrous and the invective "—Isaac Direktal Americas of Lit Skillon, (q.c.)

With strong sense, a rein of binnour, and some imagination, he had a wonderful command of the English language. His rhymes are interminable, and often spin out beyond the sense, in the wantonness of power. In judging of this old poet, we must always recollect the state of poetry in his time, and the taste of the age, which being taken into the account, we cannot help considering Skilton as an ornament of his own time, and a benefactor to these which came after him." Attospec. Sloane. Evans W. S. Grummar of British Hammar of Britis

Sloane, Evans W. S. Grammar of British He-

of Down, Ireland, 1660; after studying medicine, chomistry, and botany, in London and on the Continent, in 1678 embarked for Jamaica, where he resided for fifteen months; was Physician to Christ's Hospital, London, 1694-1730; President of the College of Physicians, 1719-33; President of the Royal Society, 1727-40; made Physician-General to the Army, and a baronet, 1716; d. 1752. He left a remarkable collection,—50,000 volumes, 3516 MSS., many specimens in various departments of natural history, &c.,—which he bequeathed to the nation, on condition that £20,000 (less, he de-clares, than one-fourth of its value) should be paid to his heirs. The terms were accepted; and the treasures thus acquired, and the Harleian MSS., were added to the Cottonian collection, and the whole formed the basis of the British Museum. He was a man of great benevo-lence, unwearied industry, and scalous in the promotion of useful knowledge. 1. But what address on he more withing.

"But what address can be more sublime
Than Sloane—the foremost toyman of his time?

Than Sloane—the foremost toymon or his time?

The sloane—the foremost toymon or his time?

How his eyes languish I how his thoughts adore
That printed coat which Joseph never wore!
He shows on holdsyes a screed pin
That touched the ruff that tonehed Queen Bean's chin,"

Smith, Adam, J.L.D., the only child of Adam Smith, Comptroller of the Customs at Kirkaldy, Scotland, and of his wife, Margaret Douglas, daughter of Mr. Douglas, of Strathenry, was b. at Kirkaldy, June 5, 1723, (a few months after the death of his father;) studied at the University of Glasgow, 1737-40, and at Balliol College, Oxford, (as an exhibitioner on Snell's foundation,) 1740-47; read lectures on rhetoric and belles-lettres at Edinburgh, under the patronage of Lord Kames, 1748-51; Professor of Logic in the University of Glasgow, 1751-52, and Professor of Moral Philosophy, 1752-63; travelled on the Continent with the Duke of Buccleuch, Murch, 1761-October, 1766; lived in retirement at Kirkaldy, engaged on his Wealth of Nations, 1766-76; resided chiefly in London, 1776-78; appointed one of the Commissioners of His Majosty's Customs in Scotland in 1778, missioners of IIIs Majority's Customs in Scotland in 1778, and thereupon removed to Edinburgh, where he resided until his death, July, 1790. In 1787 he was elected Rector of the University of Chasgow; and "no preferencit," he declares, (in his letter of acceptance to the Principal.) "could have given" him "so much real satisfaction." faction.

He was never married; though—but this interesting part of his history shall be told in the language of his friend and biographor, Dugald Stewart:

friend and biographor, Dugaid Stewart;

"In the early part of Mr. Smith's life, it is well known to his friends that he was for several years attached to a young lady of great heafty and accomplishment. How for his addresses were taxourably received, or what the circumstances wers which prevented their union. I have not been able to learn; but I believe it is pretty certain that after this desappointment he laid aside all thoughts of marriage. The lady to whom I allude died also unmarried. She survived Dr. Smith for a considerable number of years, and was alive long after the publication [1795] of the first edition of this Memorr. I had the pleasure of seeing her when she was turned of eighty: and she still tion [1705] of the first edition of this Memoir. I had the pleasure of seeing her when she was turned of eighty; and she still returned ovient truces of her former beauty. The powers of her understanding and the galety of her temper seemed to have suffered nothing from the hand of time."—Agonit of the Life and Writings of Adam Smith, LLD.

He enjoyed all the confidence of the confidence

He enjoyed all the comforts of home in the society of his mother, who died in 1784, and of his cousin, Miss Douglas, who followed her in 1788: the loss of their companionship was severely felt, and is supposed to have hastened his own end. His moral character was not only irreproachable, but his benevolence, candour, and gentleness were conspicuous, and no man seems to have been more esteemed and beloved by his friends. Among the most intimate of these was David Hume; and in Smith's Letter to Mr. Strahan on the last illness of David.

But we must not omit to refer to the graphic sketch of Smith in the Autobiography of the Rev. Dr. Alexander Carlyle, Edin., 1860, Svo, and Boste, 1861, 12mo. Among the intended works of Smith never completed was a large Treatise on Law and Government, originally announced in the preface to the first edition (1759) of his Theory of Moral Sentiments, and still promised in a late edition of that work :

"Thirty years ago," he remarks, "I entertained no doubt of being able to execute every thing which it announced."

What an affecting floord would that be which should chronicle The Uncompleted Projects of Great Minds! (See Baken, Thomas; Cole, William.)
But Smith accomplished much; and, however indifferent our reader may be to his political or his moral phi-losophy, he will find enough in the literary treatment of these themes to reward him for a careful perusal of The Wealth of Nations, The Theory of Moral Sentiments, and the Philosophical Essays.

"Adam Smith was nearly the first who made deeper reasonings and more exact knowledge popular among us."—Lord Jepensy: Contrib, lo Edin. Rev., 1853, 77, (quotation continued on p. 97, supra, of this Dictionary: Dr. Johnson's Style of Composition.)

on p. 977, supra, of this Dictionary: Ds. Johnson's Style of Currosition.

"Among the inferior excellencies of this great philosopher, it is not to be forgotten that in his full and flowing composition he manages the English language with a freer hand and with more ngive sade than any other Scottish witer. Robertson avoids Scotticians; but Smith might be taken for an English writer not peculiarly ideamatical."—Sie James Mackintush: Miscell. Wards, ed. 1804, it. 469.

"Locke, [in his Essay or Human Understanding.] Smith, [in his Westlin of Nations,] chose an easy, clear, and free, but somewhat loose and verbose, etyle,—more concise in Locke, more elegant in Smith,—his both exampt from pedantry, but not void of ambiguity and repetition."—Ibid., I. 359.

"De. Smith, the first economical philosopher, and perhaps the meat elegant theoretical moralist, of modern times."—Ris J. Mackinforn, Autobiography, in his Life, i. ch. i.

Smith, Albert, b. at Chertsey, England, May 24, 1816: became a member of the College of Surgeons, 1838, and attracted the attention of his brethren and the public by a series of papers in the Medical Times, entitled Jasper Buddle; or, Confessions of a Dissecting-Room Porter. He also contributed to The Mirror, Bentley's Miscellany, and Punch; wrote dramatic pieces for the Surrey Theatre, The Lyceum, and other stages; and soon found himself committed to a literary career. In 1850 he produced an entertainment called the Overland Mail; and on March 15, 1852, he commenced that exhibition of the Ascent of Mont Blane which, for a number of years, filled the Egyptian Hall (London) with delighted auditors and spectators. He appeared in this performance for the last time only the Monday evening preceding his death, which occurred on Wednesday mornng. May 23, 1860, at Fulham. He was the author of the following works:

Smith, Alexander, b. Dec. 31, 1830, at Kilmarnock, Ayrabire, Scotland, whilst acting as a designer of patterns for a lace-factory in Glasgow, (he was originally designed for the ministry,) forwarded the MS. of his Life Drama (subsequently included in No. 1) to the Rev. George Gilfillan, who published some extracts, with laudatory comments, in the Critic (1852) and the Eclectic Review. In 1854 he was appointed Secretary to the University of Edinburgh, (salary £300,) and retained this post until his death, Jan. 5, 1867. In 1857 he was married to Miss Flora MacDonald, of Skyc. 1. "On the whole, then, we think Mr. Smith a true poet, and a poet of no common order."—N. Brit. Rev., Aug. 1853.

"Alexander Smith's 'Life Drama,' though it abounds with remarkable verbal beauties, surpasses every thing we have net with in its display of ignorance of that kind of reality which it is a post's first duty to seize."—Edin. Rev., Oct. 1856.

Smith, Horacc, 1779-1819, and Smith, James, 1775-1839, both natives of London, and the sons of Robert Smith, Solicitor to the Board of Ordnance, varied the active pursuits of business (Horace was a stock-broker, and James his father's partner) by the pleasures of literature. Commencing joint publication by papers in The Pic-Nic, 1802, (a selection from the columns of this journal was published in 1803, 2 vols. 12mo,) they wrote several of the Prefaces to a new edition of Bell's British Theatre, (issued under Cumberland's name; James inserted an article in the London Review; and both of the brothers contributed from 1807 to 1810 to the Monthly Mirror. It was in this periodical that first appeared the poetical imitations (chiefly from Junes's pen) entitled Horace in London, which were collected into a 12mo volume in 1813, (4th ed. same year; new ed., 1815;) republished the same year in Boston. Later in life they were both contributors to the New Monthly Magazine (whilst conducted by Campbell, the poet) and to other periodicals. But it was as early as 1812 that they were so fortunate as to adopt an idea of Mr. Ward's, (Secretary to Drury-Lane Theatre,)—the publication of a collection of supposed Rejected Addresses presented for competition at the opening of the house. The volume, a 12mo of 126 pages, (Rejected Addresses; or, The New Theatrum Poetarum,) issued anonymously, met with great success: the public were delighted, the critics ap-plauded, and even the poets (a genus irritabile) pressed into the service commended the felicity of the imita-

"I think the Rejected Addresses by far the best thing of the kind since The Rolliad," writes Lord Byron (Oct. 19, 1812) to John Murray. "Tell the author I forgive him were he twenty times over our satirist, and think his initiations not at all in-ferior to the famous ones of Hawkins Browne."

And yet Murray had refused to buy the copyright for $20! He became its possessor in 1819, after the publication of the 16th edition, for £131. John Miller published the first edition, 1812, 12mo, at his own risk, keeping half profits and half copyright; and in 1813 he purchased the entire copyright and Horace in London, after the first edition, for £1000. The 22d edition yas published in 1851, 12mo, and the 24th in 1854; Railway edition, 1861, 12mo, no plates. The first American edition was published in N. York, 1813, 12md, and the last fin Boston, 1851, 16mo. A copy of the Rejected Addresses, illustrated by 600 engravings, and extended to four volumes, was sold in the city of New York in 1869 for $365. The volume was immediately chronicled in the Edinburgh Review, (Nov. 1812, 434-51,) by Lord Jeffrey; and when his lordship, in 1843, republished this critique in a cellection of his Contribations to the Edinburgh Review, he remarked, in a note, lished the first edition, 1812, 12mo, at his own risk, keephasen the entite only it and the 24th in 1854; Railway sition, 1861, 12mo, and the 24th in 1854; Railway sidition, 1861, 12mo, no plates. Whilst Horace, as we have seen, persisted in addressing a rather listless public through the medium of the press, the talents of James found a more successful vehicle in the acting of Charles Mathews: for his aid in the entertainments of Country Cousins, Air-Bullooning, Trips to Paris, and Trip to America (he contributed gratuitously to the At Home series) he received no less than £1000. "You are the only man in London," exthan £1000. "You are the only man in London," ex-claimed Mathews, "who can write what I want,—good James was not offended by the compliment, Donsense." and more than once has been heard to exclaim, when this portion of his literary career was referred to, "A thouportion of his literary career was referred to, sand pounds for nonsense!"

(1826.) In all the relations of life he was most estimable; and, as a leader in the particular branch of research which he did so much to illustrate and expand,

he did so much to illustrate and expand,

"it was his constant, earnest desire to hanish jealousy and rivalship from the pursuits of science, and to cultivate a union and good understanding between the botanists of all nations. . . .

Its found the science of botany, when he approached it, locked up in a dead language; he set it free, by transfusing into it his own. He found it a severe study, fitted only for the recluse;
he left it of easy acquisition to all. In the hands of his predecassors, with the exception of his immortal master, it was dry, technical, and scholastic; in his, it was adorned with grace and elegance, and might attract the poet as well as the philosopher, "Left of Sir J. E. Sauth, in Nichole's litted, of Lit., vi.

Professor John Frost used to say (Lects. on Botany at the London Hospitals) that William Bingley's Introduction to Botany (3d ed., ed. by Frost, 12mo) should be read as a prelude to Smith's Introduction. But we imagine that the new edits. are sufficiently self-explanatory. 20. A Tour to Hafod: see Johnes, Col. Thomas. 21. Smith, or Smyth, Captain John, b. at Willough-by, Lincolnshire, 1579, d. in London, 1831, a descendant of the Smyths of Cuerdley, has for nearly three centuries' maintained the unparalleled honour of being the most distinguished member of the most numerous family (patronymically speaking) of all the tribes of men. Silver-Topque Henry had more elequence, Cambridge John more divinity, Greek Thomas more learning, Adam and James Edward more science, and Sydney more wit; but neither of these, nor all of these, enjoy the renown which attaches to the traveller, soldier, sailor, legislator, and ruler, who was equally at home in Turkey and America, alike pre-eminent in the palaees of princes and the huts of savages. And, whilst his fame is thus worldwide, to the gratoful veneration of the children of the New World he has a peculiar claim: in the words of an eloquent American biographer, eloquent American Diographer,

"Wherever upon this continent the English language is spoken, his deeds should be recounted and his memory indicated lis services should not only be not forgotten, but chould be 'freshly remembered.' His name should not only be homored by the silent canvas and the cold marble, but his praises should dwell living upon the lips of men; and should be handed down by fathers to their children. Poetry has imagined nothing more stirring and romantic than his life and adventures, and History upon ber ample page has recorded few more konorable and spotless names."—George S. Hilland: Life of Captain John Smith, in Sparks's Amer. Biog., ii. 171-307.

own graphic narrations, we must refer the reader for the details of his "stirring and romantic life and adventures," whilst we proceed to notice him in a capacity not in-cluded in the roll of titles of honour which we have already rshearsed.

Another word on this book and its chief hero. One of Smith's latest commentators, Mr. Charles Deane, in his Notes on Wingfield's tract "A Discourse of Virginia," (Boston, 1859, sm. fol., p. p.,) remarks that the "current story" of Smith's rescue by Pocahontas "first appears in the Generall Historie," (p. 31;) and he then proceeds to argue against the probability of the oft-told talc. In this work Smith refers to a History of the Sea, on which he was then engaged; it was probably never com-plefed. Watt (Bibl. Brit.) ascribes two works to him— I. The Innocent cleared, or a Vindication of Captains John Smith, 1648, 4to; II. England's Improvement Revived, 1670, '73, 4to—which are not from his pen. We shall restore them to their lawful owners when these shall be reached,—if we ever get that far down in this multitudinous name. It is to be regretted that the Latin life of Smith by Henry Wharton, (1664-1694-54) enpra, has not been published: it is, however, a satisfaction to know that it was put into requisition by Mr. Hillard (see his Proface) when compiling his blographical sketch of the bold "Captaine: sometime Governour of Virginia" and Admirall of New England." "His body was deposited in Sepulchre's Church choir, on the south side thereof," with a rather florid enitanh. of which the following are the first and florid epitaph, of which the following are the first and last lines:

"Here lies one conquer'd that hath conquer'd kings l Oh, may his soul in sweet Elysium sleep!"

The verses, some by men of mark, which accompany his Generall Historic and others of his works, are highly sulogistic of his private character and public deeds.

Edward Robinson addresses him as

"Thou that to passe the world's four parts dost deems No more than 'twere to go to bed or drinke;"

and Thomas Carlton relieves us of the fear that he was wont, soldier and sailor like, to "drinke" too easily, by the assertion,

"I never knew a Warryer yet, but thee, From wine, tobacco, debts, dice, oaths, so free."

He published nothing; but after his death appeared his famous (9) Select Discourses; with his Life, Death, and Funeral Sermon, by Symon Patrick, (and Preface by John Worthington, D.D..) Lon., 1660, 4to; 2d ed., Camb., 1673, 4to; 3d ed., (reprinted at the suggestion of Bishop Jebb.) with his Life, by Sir David Batternike Light David Dalrymple, Lord Hailes, Lon., 1821, 8vo; 4th ed., with Patrick's Sermon, corrected and revised by Henry Origin Williams, Camb., 1859, 8vo. Lord Hailes published an edition in 1756, Edin., 12mo, in which the Discourse of Prophecy, (reprinted in Bishop Watson's Tracts, vol. iv., 1785, and also translated by Le Clere into Latin and prefixed to his Commentary on the Prophets, and that on the opinion of Aristotle on the Immortality of the Soul, are omitted. The quotations are translated. Another abridgment, with a Brief Memoir of the author by the Rev. John King, was pub. Lon., 1820, 12mo. The Discourse on The Excellency and Nobleness of True Religion, emitting the quotations from the Greeks, Romans, and Rabbis, was repub. in 1864.

"I never got so much good among all my books by a whole day's plodding in a study, as by an hour's discourse I have got with him. For he was not a library locked up, nor a book clasped, but stood open for any to converse withal that had a mind to lears. Tea, he was a fountain running over, labouring to do good to those who parhaps had no mind to receive it. Note more free and communicative than he was to such as desired to discourse with him; nor would he grudge to be taken off from his studies upon such an occasion. It may be truly said of him, that a man might always come better from him; and his mouth could drop sentences as easily as an ordinary man's could speake sense."—Bisnor Parrick: Fineral Serman on John Smith.

"He is universally admitted to have been a great reasoner, and the greatest master of rideine that has, appeared among us since Swift."—Lord Macaclas, 1847: Letter to Mrs. Sydney Smith, in Memoirs of Rev. S. Smith.

"I flud my father here, and indeed in almost every sketch of him, compared to Swift in the character of his writings. It is for others to decide upon the justness of the comparison; but there is one difference I ought, and am proud, to point out: that there is not a single line in them that might not be placed before the purity of youth, or that is unfit for the eye of a woman; that he has expressed his powers of wit and sarcasm to the atmost, without ever sullying his pages with impurities or degrading his talents and profession by irreligion: and this, I believe, can in very few instances he asserted of any other eminent humocons writer, either French or English, who have used such powers to any great extent. Lord John Russell, in writing of my father, says on this subject, 'Too much indulgence has been shown to the extravagance, dishonesty, and domestic infidelity of men of wit, as if the "light that led a-tray was light from heaven." It is not light from heaven, but flashes from a volcano which has its seat in hell;'"—Laby Holland: Memoir of Rev. N. Smith.
"If Mr. Sydney Smith had not been the greatest and most from a volcano which has its seat in hell,"—Laby Holland: Memorr of Rev. N. Smith, "If Mr. Sydney Smith had not been the greatest and most brilliant of wite, he would have been the most remarkable man of his time for a sound and vigorous understanding and great reasoning powers; and if he had not been distinguished for these, he would have been the most eminent and the purest writer of English."—Sta Henry Holland: Memoir, de.

"The first remark that I made to myself, after listening to Mr. Sydney Smith's conversation, was, that if he had not been known as the wittest man of his day, he would have been accounted one of the wiset."—Edward Evert: Memoir, dec. "Smith's reputation here then fat Edinburgh, 1797-1892] was the same as it has been throughout his life, that of a wise wit. Was there ever more sense combined with more hindrons joinlarity?"—Lord Cockburn: Memoire of his Time, ch. iii.

"Its had no philosophic turn, little postic face, and scarce any eloquence, but a prodigous fund of mnate sagacity, was powers of humorous illustration, and a clear perception of the practical bearing of every question. . . In society he was very guich sought after, from the fame of his convivial talents and the real force of his colloqual expressions; but there was a constant straining after effect, and too little interchange of thought to raise his discourse to a very high charm."—Six Ancuirald Alson: Hist, of Europe, 1815-1852, ch. v. See, also, his Essays, 1850, ni. 633. ш, 633.

"His wit and humour were always unpremeditated, and seemed not so much the result of efforts to sinuse, as the overflowing of a mind full of imagery, instantly ready to combine with whatever passed in conversation. . . . I thought him the heat preacher I ever heard; and I know of no better sormons than those ho has published.
"There are passages in them tinged with the wit which made him so delightful a companion out of the pulpit; but this does not in the least impair their sectionness. He seems to me, in these discourses, to be at all times equally earnest, eloquent, and sound in the view he takes of his subject, and the more I read them the more I find them to contain."—C. R. Leslie: Autobiog, Recollec., 1860, ch. v.

read them the more I find them to contain,"—C. R. LESLIE: Autohiog, Recollec., 1860, ch. v.

"But Sydney, Sydney is, in his way, inimitable, and, as a conversational wit, beats all the men I have ever met. Curran's fancy went much higher, but also much lower. Sydney, in his gayest flights, though bolisterous, is never vulgar."—T. Moore: Memoirs, &c. of T. Moore, vi. 315. See, also, Index.

plied with the philosopher's rather erratic fancy:

"I became acquainted with Dr. Southwood Suith. On visiting him, we saw an oldert which I have often heard celebrated, and had thought would be revolving, but found, on the contrary, an agreeable sight; this is the skeleton of Jereny Bentham. It was at Bentham's request that the skeleton, dressed in the same dress he habitually were, stuffed out to an exact resomblance of life, and with a poternit-mask in wax,—the best i ever saw — sits there as assistant to Dr. Suith in the entertainment of his guests, and companion of his studies. The figure leans a little forward, resting the hands on a stout stick which Bentham always carried, and had named 'Dapple.' The attitude is quite easy, the expression on the whole mild, winning, yet highly individual.'—MRS S. M. FULKE: quoted by John Newl in Atlantic Mon. Nov. 1805, 581.

tic Mon , Nov. 1865, 581,

If the two friends conversed, we suppose (to borrow an old pun) that it was in one of the "dead" languages. We certainly should have no hesitation in declining such a bequest, coupled with such conditions, even if the testator, legacy, and proposed "companion" were our oldest and dearest friend. 6. Smith, William, LL.D., Ph.D., well known as editor and co-author of the Classical Dictionaries which bear his name, was b. in London in 1814, educated at the University of London, (now University College,) where he gained the first prizes in the Lutin and Greek classes, and subsequently kept his terms at Gray's Inn. Fortunately for the cause of classical education, philology proved a stronger attraction than law, and those who had admired the proficiency of the student were gratified by his election to the chair of the Greek, Latin. and German Languages in the Independent Colleges of Highbury and Homerton. When in 1850 these institutions were united with Coward College, and the three were incorporated under the name of New Sollege, London, Dr. Smith was appointed Professor of the Greek and Latin Languages and Literature; in 1853 he became Classical Examiner in the University of London, and in 1867 editor of Murray's Quarterly Review. In our enumeration of his publications it will be observed that we adopt a homogeneal in preference to a chronological arrangement.

"One of our first English scholars,—one who deals with the history and philosophy of the ancient classics, as well as with the technicalities of their language."—Lon. Lit. Gazette, 1852,

To this it is proper to add that Dr. Smith's reputation as an English writer is only inferior to that which he

as an English writer is only inferior to that which he enjoys as a classical philologist and philosophical commentator. His treatise on language, and articles on classical biography, in the Ponny Cyclopedia, must be carefully perused by the student.

Smollett, Tobins George, M.D., the grandson of Sir James Smollett, of Bonbill, was born in the family mansion of Dalquhurn, parish of Cardross, Dumbartonshire, Scotland, 1721; studied at Dumbarton, and subsequently at this gow, in which city he also served an apprenticeship to a surgeon; lost his grandfather, who unde no provision for his livelihood, in his 18th year; came to London at nineteen, and, after unsuccessfully offering The Regicide for the stage, at twenty sailed as surgeon's mate in the unfortunate expedition to Carthagena, of which he gives graphic accounts in his Compendium of Voyages and in Roderick Random; settled for some time in the West Indies, where he fell in love with Anne Lascelles, whom he married in 1747; returned to London in 1746, and, after vainly trying his fortune as a physician, commenced that literary life which, with more or less application, and, despite his frequent pecuniary ombarrassments, certainly with more than average success. he followed until his death, which occurred near Leghorn, Italy, after a long illness, October 21, 1771. For the details of his social and literary career we refor the reader to the biographical sketches of Drs. Anderson and Moore to the biographical sketches of Drs. Anderson and Moore and Mr. Roscoe, and the other authorities cited below. "The person of Smollett," remarks Dr. Moore, "was stout and well proportioned, his countenance engaging, his manuer reserved, with a certain air of dignity that seemed to indicate that he was not unconscious of his own powers. He was of a disposition so humane and generous that he was ever ready to serve the unfortunate, and on some occasions to assist them beyond what his circumstances could justify. . . . His learning, different and natural acutaness would have rendered him entinent in the science of medicine had he persevered in that prefession; other parts of his character were ill suited for augmenting his practice. He could neither stoop to impose on credulity nor humour caprice,"

Dr. Moore's portrait is sufficiently favourable: a con-tentious disposition and domineering temper, a lavish indulgence in conversational sarcasm and written invostive, are freely charged upon one who seems to be equally entitled to the praise of the "humane and generous" traits accorded by this biographer.

The order of his publications was as follows: 1. Advice; a Satire, 1746, 4to. 2. Reproof; a Satire, being a Second Part of Advice, 1747, 4to. The severity of these hostile naissives made the author many enemies. 3. The Adventures of Roderick Random, Lon., 1748, 2 vols. 12mo; 1750, 2 vols. 12mo; 7th ed., 1766, 2 vols. 12mo; 10th ed., 1778, 2 vols. 12mo; Edin., 1794, 2 vols. 8vo; in German, 1778, 2 vois. 12mo; Edin., 1734, 2 vois. Svo; in German, Berlin, 1790, 2 vols. Svo, and in other foreign languages; in English, last edits, Lon., 1815, 24mo; 2 vols. 18mo; by T. Roscoe, 1836, 12mo; with Memoir, illust, by Phis, 1857, 12mo; new ed., 1866, 12mo; 1867, 6d. This imtation of he Sage at once made the author famous. 4. The Regicide; a Tragedy, 1749, 4to. Written in his 18th year. 5. The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle: in which are included the Memoirs of a Lady of Quality, which are included the Memoirs of a Lady of Quality, 1751, 4 vols. 12mo; 2d ed., pruned ofescute indelicacies, 1751, 4 vols. 12mo; 1758, 4 vols. 12mo; 1781, 4 vols. 8vo; 1784, 3 vols. 12mo; many edits: 1815, 2 vols. 24mo; 1823, 4 vols. 18mo; 2 vols. 24mo; by T. Roscoe, cuts by G. Cruikshauk, 1836, 2 vols. 12mo; new ed., 1857, 12mo. The Lady of Quality was Lady Vanc, who paid a large sum for this record of her shame. It elistically a number of treats the titles of some of which are cited a number of tracts, the titles of some of which are cited a number of tracts, the titles or some or which may recorded in Bohn's Lowndes, 2433. 6. Essay on the External Use of Water, &c., 1752, 4to. Published at a time when the attempted unsuccessfully to practing medicine at Bath. He subsequently retired to Chalges, 2465 and continued his literary employments. 7. The Adven-tures of Ferdinand Count Fathom, 1753, 2 vols. 12me; 1782, 2 vols. 8vo. Perhaps the most indecent production of a not too scrupulous writer. In this case prolixity has proved a safeguard. 8. Don Quixote; translated from the Spanish, to which is prefixed some Account of trom the Spanish, to which is preuxed some account of the Author's Life, 1755, 2 vols. 4to. Frequently re-printed in 4 vols. 18mo; also in 2 vols. 24mo, and ed. by T. Roscoe, 3 vols. 12mo. But see Jarvis, or Jervas, Charles; Lockhart, John Gisson, No. 5; Motteux, Peter Anthony; and Lord Woodhouselee's (Tytler) Essay on the Principles of Translation. His lordship shows that Smollett's translation is based upon that of shows that Smollett's translation is based upon that of Jarvis, than which it has less fidelity and more grossness. Smollett's version, so called, is indeed of little value, and by no means transfers the humour of the original:—it, by no means transfers the humour of the original:—it, however, transferred many guineas to the pockets of the ostensible translator. Coypel's Illustrations to the Adventures of Don Quixote, 25 engravings, imp. fol., by Cochin, Tardieu, &c., are highly esteemed. In 1789 the booksellers repub. that portion of Smollett's History which stretches from the Revolution to the death of George III., (1889-1780,) in 5 vols. 8vo, as a Continuation of Hume's History; and the two histories, as we have already seen, (HUGHES, THOMAS SMART, D.D., No. 4; HUME, DAVID, Nos. 3, &c.,) have been in the habit of keeping company unto this have been in the natit of keeping company unto this day,—later continuations being sometimes appended to them. Last edits. of Hume, Smollett, and Hughes, Longman, 1864, 8 vols. 8vo, £4; Bell & Paldy, 1865-66, 18 vols. or. 8vo, £3 12s. For the reign of George III., Robert Bissett's History (p. 194, supra) has been recommended. Smollett's History is never republished, and arabably never will be. One of the 50 copies on l. smd probably never will be. One of the 50 copies on 1. p., r. 8vo, 5 vols., W. Pickering, 1827, (see Huwe, David, No. 11.) in oalf by Hayday, was sold at Fowle's sale, Dec. 1864, No. 675, for $187.50. The fact, often repeated, that the Transactions of "One Thousand Eight Hundred and Three Years," (we quote his own title page.) which all his four quarto volumes, (1757-58,) were written in fourteen months, forbids confidence in the same ratio in which it excites surprise. The "uncommon spirit and correctness of his style" have been praised by Sir Walter Scott, and his statements are doubtless often correct, (though, indeed, in many cases, as Dr. Johnson said to the Lichfield aklerman, it is "impossible that he should the hieument anterman, it is impossion that he should know it;") but the cautious student will be unwilling to take him as authority. Notices of the llistory will be found in the Crit. Rev.; Dr. Thomas Comber's Vindication of the Revolution in England, 1668, &c., 1758, 8vo; Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lects. In most of those authorities the critics display their inmost of these authorities the critics display their ingenuity, sometimes their judgment, in running contrasts between Smollett and Fielding. Sir Walter Scott's paral-lel is particularly commended to the reader.

"Smollett's humour arises from the situation of the persons or the peculiarity of their external appearance; as from Rode-rick Random's carroty locks, which hung down over his shoulders like a pound of candles, or Stray's ignorance of Lordon, and the blunders that follow it. There is a tone of vulgarity about the blunders that follow it. There is a tone of walgarity about all his productions. The incidents frequently resemble detached ancedotes taken from a newspaper or magazine, and, like those in '(dil Blas,' might happen to a hundred other characters. He exhibits the ribucious accidents and reverses to which human life is hable,—not the stuff of which it is composed. He seldom probes to the quick, or penetrates beyond the surface, and, therefore, he leaves no stings in the minds of his readers, and in this respect is far less interesting than Fielding. His novels always enliven and never tire us; we take them up with pleasure, and lay them down without any strong feeling of regret. We look on and laugh as spectators of a highly amusing scene, without closing in with the combatants or being made marties. without closing in with the combatants or being made parties in the event."—HAZLITT: Eng. How critics disagree!

How critics disagree!

"Smollett saems to have had more touch of romance than Fielding, but not so profound and intuitive a knowledge of himanity's hidden treasures. There is nothing in his works comparable to Parson Adams; but then, on the other hand, Fielding has not any thing of the kind equal to Strap. Partridge is dry and hard, compared with this poor larber-loy, with his generous overflowings of affection. Roderick Random, indeed, with its varied delineation of life, is almost a romance. Its here is worthy of his name. He is the sport of futner, rolled about through the 'many ways of wretchedness,' almost without resistance, but ever catching those tastes of joy which are everywhere to be relished by those who are willing to receive them. We seem to roll on with him and get delectably giddy in his company."—Six T. N. Talrourd: New Month. Mag., and in his Ord. and Miscell, Writings.

"Smollett inherited from nature a strong sense of ridicule, a great fund of original humour, and a happy versatility of talent, by which he could accommodate his style to almost every species of writing. He could adopt, alternately, the solemn, the lively, the sarreatic, the burlesque, and the vulgar. To those qualifications he joined an inventive genius and a vigorous imagination."—Loan Woomouseles, (Titles:) Essay on the Principles of Translation.

Somers, John, Lord Somers, one of the most illustrious characters of English political history, the son of un attorney, was b. at Worcester, 1650; entered hunself of the Middle Temple, and in 1674 was admitted a Commoner of Trinity College, Oxford; was called to the Bar, 1676, and commenced practice in London, 1682; one of the counsel for the seven bishops, 1688; at the Revolution, 1689, was a member-of the first and chairman of the second of the committees which prepared the Declaration of Right; Solicitor-General, and knighted, May, 1689; Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, March 23, 1692; Attorney General, May 2, 1692: made Lord Chancellor and raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Somers of Evesham, in the county of thoucester, 1697; deprived of the Great Seal, April 17, 1700; impeached and acquitted, 1701; President of the Royal Scolery, 1702; President of the Council, 1708, and held this office till the recovery of the Cabinet of Harley and the Tories in 1710; d. of apoplexy, April 26, 1716.

As an author he is chiefly known by his following publications: 1. The Memorable Case of Denzil Onslow, E-q., tried at the Assizes in Surrey, July 20, 1681, touching his Election. 2. Brief History of the Succession of the Crown, 1681; again, 1714. 3. Just and Modest Vindication of the Proceedings [on the exclusion of the Duke of York] of the two Last Parliaments, 1681. First penned by Algernon Sidney; drawn out ancw (at supra) by Somers: finally corrected by Sir William Jones, M.P. (1566-1640.) Pub. in Baldwin's collection of pamphlets in the Reign of Charles II. 4. The Security of Englishmen's Lives; or, The Trust, Power, and Duty of the Grand Juries of Eugland, &c., 1681; 1715; Edin., 1718, 8vo; Lon., 1765, (some 1766,) 8vo. Notices of other publications of Somers will be found in Biog. Brit.; Park's Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors; the Memoirs of his lordship; and several of the authorities cited below. He contributed poetical versions of Ovid's Epistles of Dido to Anens and of Ariadne to Thesens, to Tonson's edition of Ovid's Epistles in English; and a translation of Plutarch's Life of Alcabiades to the English Plutarch by Various Hands, also published by Tonson. The poem entitled Dryden's Satire to his Muse (written early in 1632) is attributed to Somers, but challenged by Walpole. Many of his MSS., some original, were destroyed after his death by a fire in the Chambers of his relative, Mr. Charles Yorke, Solicitor-General.

Somerville, Lorenzo. Eros: a Scries of Conected Poems, Lon., 1866, 12mo. Not commended by Atlantic Monthly, Aug. 1866, 265.

Somerville, Mary, a daughter of Admiral Fairfax, of the British Navy, b. 1780, at Burntisland, Fifeshire, Scotland, and married first to Mr. Greig, (a British cofficer,) and subsequently to Dr. Somerville, first structed notice by avarentments on the magnetic influence. tracted notice by experiments on the magnetic influence of the violet rays of the solar spectrum, (see Lon. Quar. Rev., xlvii. 547; Edin. Rev., lix. 171.) and has since gained great and deserved reputation by the four follow-Lon., 1831, 8vo; Phila., 1832, 18mo. Elicited by the request of Lord Brougham that Mrs. Sumerville would request of Lord Brougham that Mrs. Somerville would prepare for the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Know-alodge a popular summary of the Méasnique Céleste of La Place. The MS. was submitted to Sir J. F. W. Herseschel, who pronounced it a book for posterity, but above the class whose instruction was designed by Lord Brougham. It was, therefore issued as an independent work. The demonstrations of La Place are adopted, modified, or superseded, according to the judgment of Mrs. Somerville. The Preliminary Dissertation (ppe 70) was subsequently expanded into No. 2.

"This unquestionably is one of the most remarkable works that female intellect ever produced, in any age or country; and, with respect to the present day, we hazard little in saying that Mrs. Somerville is the only individual of her sex in the world who could have written it."—Edin. Rev., April, 1832, 1-25.

How the reviewer arrived at the last item of informs tion with which he favours us, we are not salvied. An exhaustive and impartial investigation could alone furtify such a condition.

"Mrs. Somerville's delightful volume on the 'Connexion of the Physical Sciences.' The style of this astonishing production is so clear and unaffected, and conveys, with so much simplicity, on great a mass of profound knowledge, that it should be placed in the jamis of every youth the moment he has mastered the general rudiments of education."—Los. Sharp wit, keen satire, characterize his volumes."—Dr. Dop-

"Wit was his talent; yet he often reaches sublimity. He is, however, one of these authors who, in some respects, are to be admired and not imitated. To excite a laugh from the pulpit is to inspire the hearer with a levity of temper ill adapted to the indulgence of devotional feelings."—DR. KNOX.

"South had great qualifications for that popularity which attends the pulpit, and his manner was at that time original. Not diffuse, not learned, not formal in argument like Barrow, with a more natural structure of sentence, a more pointed, though by no means a more fair and satisfactory, turn of reasoning, with a ctyle clear and English, free from all padantry, but abounding with those colloquis novelties of fairon which, though now become vulgar and offensive, the age of Charles II.

affected; sparing no personal or temperary sarrasm; but if he seems for a moment to tread on the verge of buffonery, recovering himself by some stroke of vigorous sense and language; such was the witty Dr. Sonth, whom the courtiers delighted to hear."—Hallan: Lit. Southcott, Joanna, a silly, ignorant enthusiast or designing impostor, as opinions vary, was b. in Devonshire about 1750, and for a long time gained her living honestly and respectably as a domestic servant; commenced prophesying about 1792; professed to lay in of the Shiloh, Oct. 19, 1814, at 12 r.m., (baying then, it is asserted, 100,000 followers;) d., probably of the dropsy that nided her delusions, Dec. 27, 1814. Her resurrection was long looked for; and as late as 1851 there were in England four small congregations of her disciples, nor were believers extinct in 1866. Her history, we are happy to say, does extinct in 1860. Her nistory, we are nappy to say, dues not enter into the plan of our work: we cannot, however, entirely exclude from a Dictionary of Authors one who put forth nearly sixty publications, (London, Stourbridge, Leeds, 1792-1814,) declarative, expositive, or prephetic. Among the best-known of these are: 1. The Strange Effects of Faith, with Remarkable Prophecies, 6 and Dr. Reader 1861.2.

Southerne, or Southern, Thomas, b. at Oxmanton, co. of Dublin. 1600; was admitted a student of Trinity College, Dublin, 1676; entered the Middle Temple, London, 1678, but cultivated dramatic literature in preference to law, and became a popular writer of plays; served a short time in the army, where he attained the rank of captain, and after his retirement continued his literary pursuits,—which were successful both in point of profit (by one play he cleared £700) and as an introduction to the best company (Dryden, Pope, Gray, &c.) of his day. He is said to have died "the oldest and the richest of his dramatic brethren." This would make him neither a Methuselah nor a Crasus. He died May 26, 1746, in his 86th year. A collection of his plays was published Lon., 1713, 2 vols. 12mo; again, 1721, 2 vols. 12mo; and a better one, under 12mo; again, 1/21, 2 vois. 12mo; and a sector one, under the following title, Plays written by Thomas Spathern, Esq., now first collected, with an Account of the Life and Writings of the Author, 1774, 3 vols. 12mo. ones thus commented on by Mr. Hallam:

"Southern's Discovery, latterly represented under the name of featelfal, is almost as familiar to the lovers of our theatre as Venice Preserved itself; and for the same reason, that whenever an arisess of great fragic powers arises, the part of Esabelii is as fitted to exidicit them as that of Belvicken. The choice and conduct of the story are, however, Southern's chief merita; for there is little vigour in the language, though it is natural, and free from the usual faults of his age. A similar character may be given to his other tragedy, Oronoko, in which Southern descrives the praise of having first of any English writer denounced the traffic in slaves and the cracities of their West Indian bondage. The moral feeling is high in this fragedy, and it has sometimes been acted with a certain success; but the execution is not that of a superior dramatist."—Ltd. Hist. of Descript, ill., Pt. 4, ch. r. sec. xivi.

"Mr. Gray," say Mason, "always thought highly of his pathetic powers, at the same time that he biamed his ill taste for mixing them so injudiciously with farce, in order to produce that monetrous species of composition called Tragi-Comady."

In his latter days Southerns regretted that he had not

Southern Robert, LL.D., whose earlier days have some briefly referred to on a preceding page, (see Collection) Saware Taxlen,) was the son of a linen-draper of Bristol, where he was born, August 12, 1774; received his marty education at Bristol, Corston, and (from 1788 to 1771) Westminster; was admitted to Belliol College, Oxford, Nov. 3, 1792, (his uncle, the Rev. Herbert Hill, Uxford, Nov. 3, 1102. In his youth he was for a short time "a libe-21, 1843. In his youth he was for a short time "a liberal," both in politics and religion: his later opinions respecting Church and State were of a very different cast. In 1807 he received for literary services a pension, of which the clear receipts, £144 per annum, were appropriated to pay the premiums on his life insurance, the had previously been indebted to his friend C. W. W. Wynn for £160 per annum;) on the death of Pye he was made Poet-Laurente; in 1821 he was honoured by the University of Oxford with the degree of LL.D.; in 1835, by the good offices of Sir Robert Peel, he was placed upon the Civil List for a pension of £300, having previously declined a baronetey; he was also returned to Parliament for the borough of Downton, but refused to serve. The particulars of his life, expanded to great length in his voluminous correspondence, will be found in the volumes, hereafter to be noticed, published by his son and son-in-law, the Rev. Charles Cuthbert Southey and the Rev. John Wood Warter.

Greatly embarrassed for many years of his life by the ous exertion and provident foresight in his life insurance to leave to his heirs about £12,000, and a very valuable library, afterwards sold at auction in London: see Fraser's Magazine, xxx. 87; Kerslako's Catalogue of Books, containing a Considerable Portion of the Library of the Late Robert Southey, Bristol, (1845,) 8vo.
